CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1915.

(Legislative day of Friday, February 19, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

CUCUMBER-DISEASE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have read a telegram bearing upon an important matter pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

ANN ARBOR, MICH., February 20, 1915.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

I urge you to secure special appropriation of $5,000 for cucumber-disease investigation by the Department of Agriculture. Cucumber diseases cost Michigan farmers $2,000,000 last year. Similar losses in Indiana, Ohio, Wisconsin, New York; not only the farmers but all the pickling companies are bearing enormous losses. It is not too much to say that entire cucumber and pickling industry in certain sections Michigan is in precarious condition, due to ravages of plant diseases. We need research by Department of Agriculture to cooperate with special State investigation.

G. H. COONS,
Plant Pathologist, Michigan Agriculture College.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I desire to say that it is my intention to offer an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill appropriating $5,000 for this purpose. I give notice to that effect now, and hope that the adoption of the amendment will be unanimous.

POST OFFICE CLERKS.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I present telegrams from the representatives of 25 postal clerks of the Terre Haute (Ind.), Branch of the Railway Mail Association; 40 postal clerks of the Evansville (Ind.) Branch of the Railway Mail Association; 160 postal clerks of northern Indiana; and 300 postal clerks with headquarters at Indianapolis, all remonstrating against the proposed change from annual to biennial promotions in the Railway Mail Service. I ask that the telegrams may be printed in the RECORD, and, inasmuch as the Post Office appropriation bill has been reported and is on the calendar, that they lie on the table for consideration in connection with that measure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall not object to this request, but I shall object to the consideration of any further subject until the Army appropriation bill has been disposed of.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TERRE HAUTE, IND., February, 11, 1915.

Hon. B. F. SHIVELY,
Washington, D. C.:

Twenty-five railway postal clerks oppose biennial promotion amendment to Post Office appropriation bill.

JAMES T. LASH,
President Terre Haute Branch, R. M. A.

EVANSVILLE, IND., February 11, 1915.

Senator B. F. SHIVELY,
Washington, D. C.:

Forty railway postal clerks of Evansville respectfully ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotions.

C. E. JONES,
President Evansville Branch.

KENDALLVILLE, IND., February 11, 1915.

Senator SHIVELY,
Washington, D. C.:

One hundred and sixty northern Indiana railway postal clerks ask you to oppose change from annual to biennial promotions in the Railway Mail Service.

S. E. CRAWFORD,
President Elkhart Branch.

IRVINGTON, IND., February 11, 1915.

Senator B. F. SHIVELY,
Washington, D. C.:

Over 300 railway postal clerks, with headquarters at Indianapolis, respectfully ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotions for the men of this service.

C. H. DILL.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out the proviso on page 70.

The amendment was, on page 70, after line 12, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and no claim for services performed by any person while violating this proviso shall be allowed.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the pending amendment proposes to strike out the language inserted by the House Committee on Military Affairs and by the House, which provides that no part of the appropriation made in the bill shall be made available; in short, for any attempt on the part of the Government to install what is known as the Taylor efficiency system.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have received a large number of communications on this subject and I should like to hear what the Senator from New Jersey has to say upon the matter. I can not hear a word that he is saying, because of the confusion in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, there is nothing new about this proposal. There is nothing new about this system which it is proposed to have installed in the Government arsenals, navy yards, and everywhere throughout the Government service. A gentleman named Taylor arrived at the conclusion that the laboring people of the United States are not working hard enough for the money that they get, and he has evolved the idea that by a system——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this is quite an important statement that the Senator from New Jersey is making. Many of us are interested in it, and I do hope that we can have order so as to be able to hear him.

Mr. HUGHES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. There is so much conversation going on in the rear of the Chamber that I can not hear a word the Senator is saying.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be a vain hope to obtain absolute order.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] made a report upon this subject at one time, and I will take the liberty of quoting from that report.

First, I will say Mr. Taylor had arrived at the conclusion—he says so very frankly in one of his pamphlets—that there is a mistaken notion abroad in the land on the part of laboring people to the effect that industrial establishments are run more or less for their benefit. He desires at the outset to have that notion corrected, and he calls their attention and the attention of manufacturers in general to the fact that industrial establishments are not run for the benefit of laboring people, but that they are run solely for the purpose of producing dividends for the manufacturers.

And once that proposition is laid down and admitted, then I admit that Mr. Taylor is absolutely correct, and that a system such as he has devised is admirably fitted to bring about the result he seeks, which is the production of dividends for manufacturers at the expense of the bones and tissue and the lives of the people engaged in those manufactories. This is the reverse of the proposition which we have so often advocated on the floor of the Senate and other legislative bodies in the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, still, as near as the Senator from New Jersey is to me, I can not hear him. I wish there might be order in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator will have to suspend until the Senate is in order. There is complaint about the inability of Senators to hear him.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, for a great many years there has been more or less in effect what is known as the eight-hour law. In certain departments of the Government it has been altogether in effect. Under certain circumstances when work has been done by contract for the Government it has been partially in effect. Under other circumstances, by the decisions of various heads of departments, the law has been nullified.

Recently the National Legislature enacted a law which was intended to put an end for all time to these matters of construction by various heads of departments and make the United States Government as an employer an eight-hour employer. It was then said that when the Government of the United States became an employer it should be the best sort of employer that there was; that it should set a standard and should be an example to other employers throughout the United States. It was largely for that reason and not because of the great amount of manufacturing that the Government did, and not because of the great number of men who were involved, but because of the value of the example which was to be set by the Government of the United States as an employer, that the eight-hour law was passed.

Now, for the reverse of the proposition. Mr. Taylor is finding difficulty in turning the laboring people of America into cogs of the various industrial machines. He is finding difficulty in having the most hard-hearted manufacturers in the United States regard the laboring people simply as raw material, to be purchased in a certain way, to be carried on the cost sheets at so much per head. He is having difficulty in having other manufacturers absolutely eliminate the human equation. His idea and the idea of such manufacturers as he has succeeded in enlisting under his banner is to have the United States Government install the Taylor efficiency system, under which a stop watch is held on a man, the number of steps that he takes between a pile of pig iron and the place where he finally deposits it is to be counted. A strong, vigorous man is taken as the standard, the day's work is set, and every other man who comes into that establishment is set to perform the task that was set by this physically fit man working at top speed, and unless he is able to do that he goes into the discard.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has thought over the suggestion which was made informally last night as to dividing the amendment. I think quite a number of Senators are disposed to agree with the Senator from New Jersey regarding the stop-watch proposition. As to the premium feature, however, of the amendment there seems to be a difference of mind. Some of the employees seem to want to retain that system. I have received a good many hundred letters both ways from employees of arsenals and other Government institutions in Philadelphia.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that I have thought over that suggestion, and I thought favorably of it to this extent, that if I could not get enough votes to defeat the whole system we would be glad to welcome those who are in favor of abolishing the stop watch. But I speak from experience, and in my opinion the premium system is worse than the stop-watch system.

Mr. PENROSE. I have, I suppose, seven or eight hundred letters purporting to be from employees of the Frankford Arsenal and other military and naval institutions in Philadelphia advocating the premium system. On the other hand, I have a number against it.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not any doubt that is so. I have no personal knowledge of the facts, but it is stated to me by a man in whom I have confidence that the petition filed, referred to in the debate yesterday by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], was obtained by the officers of the Frankford Arsenal practically under duress.

Mr. PENROSE. That may be. I do not know about that.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator allow me just a word?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. I think from all the evidence I have there is not the slightest ground for that. My reason for thinking so is because the employees who signed that petition again wrote me asking that they be allowed to come down here or to send a delegation here to present the matter to the Committee on Military Affairs. I made that request of the committee on their behalf, but as the committee decided to strike out the House provision it was not necessary for them to come down. So, if those men were acting under duress, certainly they were acting very strangely when they requested me to arrange for their appearance here and to advocate the elimination of the House provision.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit one more word, and then I am done?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not opposed to this amendment as it stands, but I confess that I am in some confusion as to the real wishes of the employees in Philadelphia, at least, where several thousand are employed in manufacturing munitions of war, as to whether or not they want the premium system. I make the inquiry of the Senator from New Jersey, who I know is in close touch with those conditions, to get information, as much as anything else, although I am prepared to vote for the whole amendment if I can be persuaded that the whole amendment is wanted by the employees.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, there is not any doubt in my mind as to what those who are informed at the Frankford Arsenal, at every other arsenal, and at every navy yard throughout the country, want. They are now operating under a system which is sufficiently drastic, in my opinion, and which offers abundant opportunity for intelligent management to develop the highest kind of efficiency.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question right there?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the attitude of the Department of Labor and what is the attitude of Government officials who supervise this work and under whom these men are employed? What position do they take in regard to it?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say that every committee that has examined this proposition has either condemned it or refused to favor it. There is not a single line of any report of any committee in favor of it. It has been investigated on several occasions, it was investigated by the Committee on Education and Labor, of which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] at that time was chairman; it has been investigated by the Committee on Labor on the other side of the Capitol, the present Secretary of Labor, William B. Wilson, being chairman, and both those reports condemn the Taylor system.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me that the department ought to give us some expression of opinion about a matter of this kind.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. In answer to the question of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], I will say that I have here the last report of the Chief of Ordnance, which deals with this subject somewhat in extenso, and I shall presently call the attention of the Senate to his observations, which are very practical.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, at the Watertown Arsenal there is now established the following system for determining the efficiency of men engaged in work in that establishment——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey permit one suggestion?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I think it ought to be stated to the Senate that that arsenal is the only one, so far as I am informed, that has the Taylor system or the stop-watch system. It does not prevail at the Frankford Arsenal, as I understand.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that, so far as this goes, it contains no provision for premium payment.

Mr. PENROSE. No.

Mr. HUGHES. It contains no provision for timing or stop watching, but it does contain a great many provisions under which any intelligent job manager can determine the efficiency of men under his control. They are given figures for attendance; they are given figures for sobriety, for cheerfulness, and for ability. They are given a mark for their habits.

Habits: In estimating habits, consideration should be given to sobriety, integrity, subordination, cheerful and zealous obedience to orders and regulations. Frequent tardiness and drunkenness on duty will be made the subject of special inquiry. A deduction of 10 points for every absence after Sundays, holidays, or pay days for each day or part of day without having previously obtained leave therefor will be made, and a deduction of 10 points will be made for tardiness in getting to work after reporting.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator, in a few words, explain definitely and precisely what the stop-watch system is? What does it require of the workingmen?

Mr. HUGHES. I will try to do that. I am proceeding in a ragged sort of way. This is the way Mr. Taylor explains it:

For example, a workman has been doing a piece of work in 190 minutes. After painstaking study of the job and of all the means of saving time, the man is carefully instructed as to these means, and is told that for every minute saved, within, say, 120 minutes, he will be paid for half a minute at his regular rate, in addition to his regular daily pay; and that it is thought that he can do the work in 72 minutes, for which time the increase over his regular pay will amount to 33⅓ per cent.

I think, perhaps, the paragraphs I shall now read will best answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire. This is also from Mr. Taylor's "Manual of Shop Management":

"His first step was to place an intelligent, college-educated man in charge of progress in this line. This man had not before handled this class of labor, although he understood managing workmen. He was not familiar with the methods pursued by the writer, but was soon taught the art of determining how much work a first-class man can do in a day. This was done by timing with a stop watch a first-class man while he was working fast. The best way to do this—in fact, almost the only way in which the timing can be done with certainty—is to divide the man's work into its elements and time each element separately. For example, in the case of a man loading pig iron onto a car, the elements should be: Picking up the pig iron from the ground or pile (time in hundredths of a minute). Walking with it on a level (time per foot walked). Walking with it up an incline to car (time per foot walked). Throwing the pig down (time in hundredths of a minute), or laying it on a pile (time in hundredths of a minute). Walking back empty to get a load (time per foot walked)."

The problem of inducing the employees to work at the pace required is solved, first, by offering a bonus or premium to those who succeed, and if this does not get results other more drastic means are used.

It is the business of the shop disciplinarian to see that a system of discipline is in vogue and enforced that is adequate to induce everyone to make sure that his part of the work comes in on schedule time. The system of discipline advocated by Mr. Taylor consists of—

1. Lowering the man's wages.
2. Laying him off for a period of time.
3. Fining him all the way from 1 cent to $60.
4. Discharging him.

It is also regarded as a good plan to continually keep enough men on hand so as to be able to discharge a workman every now and then for failing to continue at the pace required, because of its moral effect on the rest of the workmen.

When the system is first installed the high speed can not immediately be attained. It must be worked up to gradually, and therefore the kind of bonus system used is as drastic as the degree of perfection to which the system has attained will permit.

This is all from Mr. Taylor.

The gradual acceleration of the speed at which the workmen labor is accomplished by the premium and bonus above referred to, the system of discipline, and by the gradual elimination of the workmen who are unable to keep up to the rising standards of performance.

I think I can safely say that it is admitted by everybody, by the proponents and opponents of the Taylor system, that the bonus or premium system is a necessary part of it. Without that the stop-watching amounts to nothing and without the stop-watching timing system the bonus or premium system amounts to nothing. For example, he says—

The system of bonuses now in vogue at the Watertown Arsenal, where the Taylor system has not yet reached an advanced stage—

They have got the camel's nose under the tent at the Watertown Arsenal, as this gentleman frankly admits. He is right about it, and I have no occasion to believe that he is anything but absolutely honest and fair in all his statements, because this is his business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not informed on this subject, and I am asking questions for information. I will ask the Senator if this system has been installed in other manufacturing establishments and arsenals?

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator refer to Government establishments?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I refer to those operated by private parties.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; as nearly as I can gather this system has been installed in about 200 manufacturing establishments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inferred so from some letters which I have received.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I understand, in the first place, they established it in the Bethlehem Steel Co., where they managed to get a crew of select men together, who were, each one, able to carry 300 tons of pig iron over a given distance in a day; which is something like an increase of 300 per cent. Of course, it was a terrific strain on the men; they had to be carefully picked and selected; but the effort was made to establish that as the standard of what a man should be able to do in a day.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, as the Senator from New Hampshire has asked the question, if I may be permitted, I should like to say that the Taylor system, so called, is nothing new at all. The Taylor system is simply a new name for a process which has existed as long as manufacturing has been carried on as a corporate operation. It arose at a time when the manufacturing of articles in factories first began, and it arose from the necessity of finding a basis upon which to fix the rate of wages. The Taylor system is an attempt to fix those wages more scientifically, more accurately, and more justly to the employee, and to avoid the constant friction which arises in manufacturing establishments from the failure to fix rates of wages on a scientific basis.

In its latest development, as it is referred to here, it is an attempt to study the activities of working men to see if by examining them in detail and finding out just how long it takes a man to perform each one of a series of complicated operations it may not be possible to teach him to perform them more scientifically, in that way making him a more efficient workman, making it possible for him to accomplish more, and therefore earning more, and also to avoid the constant friction in factories which comes from mistakes made by the managers and operators of them in using a wrong basis upon which to fix the prices at which men are paid.

The whole thing comes back to about the condition in which we find Mr. Ty Cobb. In playing baseball Mr. Ty Cobb steps up to the plate and with a single swing is able to send the ball out into left field, to the great delight of the people who are in favor of the Detroits and often to the disgust of the people who are "rooting" for the Washingtons. I do not suppose it causes Ty Cobb any more effort to send a ball into left field at a single stroke of the bat than it does some other less experienced man to bat at the ball and miss it; but because Ty Cobb is accurate, is trained, and has skill in that matter he is paid ten, twelve, or fifteen thousand dollars a year, or whatever it may be. Now, there are men in the factories who have that same accurate eye, who have that same experience and same skill in swinging a hammer, perhaps, and they are worth more to their employer, to the manager of the factory, than a less skillful workman, just as Mr. Ty Cobb is worth more to the manager of a baseball team. It seems only reasonable that the Ty Cobbs of the factories should receive compensation in accordance with their skill.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, there does not seem to be any disagreement between the opponents and the proponents of this proposition. As the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has said, there is nothing new about the Taylor system. There is nothing new in it, at least to any man who comes from an industrial town. Perhaps it is called by a new name, but since factories were established, and since it became important to make money out of them, there has been an attempt made to squeeze everything that there was in the way of production out of the main element in manufacturing, and that is the human element. Within my own experience and in my own town I have known a system to be in operation which was even cleverer in some respects than the Taylor system. They did not bother with having a man with a stop watch timing the number of beats that a loom made, timing how long it took a man to thread a shuttle, how long it took him to change it, how long it took him to throw back the cards to get the proper place in the pattern. They eliminated all that. When a new job was started up they sent a man in and gave him a loom or two looms, as the case might be, and they paid him secretly four or five dollars a week more than they paid anybody else. Then they provided him with a certain preparation, the favored preparation, as I recall, being cod-liver oil and whisky, so that a man could key himself up—"stimulate himself" is the term that Taylor uses—to such an extent that he could do more work than any normal human being could do in the same time, and at the end of a week or two he drew his regular pay, and the wages of other operatives were based on the amount that appeared in his envelope, no one except the manager knowing about the four or five dollars he received in addition for the extraordinary effort that he had made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not mean that the employers provided whisky for the men?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know who provided the whisky, but there is not any doubt that it was done.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator if it is not a scientific fact that the taking of that whisky, while it may have spurred the man on to increased efforts for a little while, had its reaction and made him less capable of performing labor a short time afterwards?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know. As to that I can not say of my own personal knowledge. I am speaking now of the pacemakers. It was understood that that was the favorite mixture or preparation of the pacemakers in the mills. There might not have been very much whisky in it; it might have been more cod liver oil than whiskey. I am not familiar, as I have said, with the component parts of the preparation, but that there were pacemakers who did stimulate themselves with alcohol, and, in some cases, as I recall, even with cocaine, there can not be any question.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, possibly the inquiry I am about to make had better be submitted to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], but perhaps the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] can satisfy my mind on the subject. I should like to know how long this stop-watch surveillance of an employee continues? It seems from what has been said by the Senator from Rhode Island the purpose of it is to ascertain the employee's fitness and efficiency. If that be so, I would suppose that his capacity might be determined within a reasonable time, and that the continuance of that sort of thing would be entirely unnecessary and unjust.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I will endeavor to answer the question; or does the Senator from New Jersey desire to answer it?

Mr. HUGHES. I will answer by saying that, of course, the timing by the stop watch continues only until the standard or unit time for a particular process is determined, and then it ceases. As soon as it is determined that a man should make a certain number of castings or produce a certain quantity of a certain kind of work in a certain time, the necessity for timing him ceases, although Mr. Taylor suggests that there ought to be some way whereby it can be made apparent to the operative at every stage of his work whether or not he is catching up or losing. That would not necessarily involve timing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator referred to the fact that in a silk factory the question of production by a weaver depended upon his being stimulated by artificial means.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not say that.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. HUGHES. No. I do not want to get involved in a controversy of that sort. I have seen questions like that lead to one or two days' debate in this body.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the person who can produce the most yards from a loom is the person who can keep the loom running all the time; and that is not by any strength that he may have; it is due to his ability to keep his ends of the warp straight and not let them get tangled. The hardest work I ever put in on a loom in my life was the first warp that I ever wove, and the least that I ever produced in a day was upon that first warp. And the result was that before I got halfway through with the weaving of the 800 yards warp it was so tangled that I had to have somebody come and help me out with it. It did not take very long, however, for me to learn, the same as others, to keep it straight, and when it was kept straight I had the easiest work in my life. The very best weaver there is in any mill in the world is the person who has the least work to do, and lets the loom run, and knows how to keep it going. There is no need of any stimulus being offered to any weaver in order that he may get out more yards from the loom. It is not true.

Mr. HUGHES. Which shows that "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing." The Senator was weaving on a broad silk loom undoubtedly; was he not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the first loom I ever wove on was weaving linseys and running a couple of narrow looms.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator knew anything at all about weaving, he would have understood my question, which he has already misunderstood.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not woven thousands and tens of thousands and millions of yards without knowing something about it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. There is a distinction in the mind of anybody who pretends to be a silk weaver, or there ought to be a distinction, between broad silk and ribbon looms. They are the two great fundamental divisions.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, there is a difference between the two.

Mr. HUGHES. Was the Senator a broad-silk weaver or a ribbon weaver?

Mr. SMOOT. I say, there is a difference between broad looms and ribbon looms.

Mr. HUGHES. And the Senator was a broad-silk weaver; was he not?

Mr. SMOOT. I was a broad-loom weaver; yes.

Mr. HUGHES. A broad-silk weaver or a broad-loom weaver. I was speaking of ribbon looms, which, as the Senator knows, are entirely different. The ribbons vary in width, and there may be 50 or 60 of them abreast, running along a great batten, each of them fed by a small quill, and the necessity existing for the quill to be changed every time it runs out, so that the number of stoppages is a hundred times greater than on a broad-silk loom, depending entirely upon the speed with which the weaver gets from one of those little ribbons to the other to change the quill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the principle is exactly the same.

Mr. HUGHES. Why, the Senator was never more mistaken in his life.

Mr. SMOOT. The question of changing a bobbin in one loom is no different from the question of changing a bobbin in another, and the weaver becomes proficient from the practice that he or she may have. Some weavers can weave all their lives and never become proficient, and others can take it up very quickly and it becomes second nature to them.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator is possessed of about as much misinformation on that subject as anybody I have ever come in contact with who pretended to be a weaver. I will say to the Senator that there could not be anything more fundamentally different than broad and ribbon loom weaving. I come from a town where as much silk is woven as in any town in the United States, and where for a time, until a very short time ago, more silk was woven than in all the rest of the United States put together. The difference between broad silk and ribbon weaving is so great that for a great many years the broad-silk man was not permitted to work on a ribbon loom and a ribbon-loom weaver could not work on a broad-silk loom, and that distinction is to a great extent preserved to-day. The operatives in that town are known as broad-silk weavers and ribbon-loom weavers; and when the Senator says that the changing of the shuttle and the work on the broad-silk loom is practically the same as the changing of the bobbin and the work and operation of a ribbon loom, he simply shows to everybody who knows anything about the subject that he knows nothing at all about it. I do not want to continue that discussion any further.

Mr. SMOOT. I said the principle was the same, and I maintain it. I am perfectly willing to admit, of course, that I do not know as much about manufacturing as the Senator from New Jersey. I filled every position there is in the mill, from the worker to the superintendent. I have been in those mills, and I have woven millions of yards; but, of course, I do not know as much about it as the Senator from New Jersey does.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. What is the subject under discussion?

Mr. HUGHES. The ability of the Senator from Utah to weave.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The relative capacity of the two Senators to spin.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator, out of the little knowledge that he has of weaving, took occasion to make an absolute statement to the effect that a statement I made to the Senate of my own personal knowledge was untrue, which, as the boys say, is "going some."

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. HUGHES. Nevertheless, I repeat what I said before, that weavers were habitually stimulated; that there were a class of weavers known as pacemakers, and that the rate of speed at which a man worked made a great difference in the amount of his production, and before Mr. Taylor was born they were stimulating men. Before Mr. Taylor was heard of they were attempting to set a day's work for men and women and children which they could not possibly perform except when they were at the very height of their powers. The industrial system was based on the theory, so far as it could be put into effect, that a day's wages was to go to a man who could produce at the top of his powers, taking no account of those who were coming to that period, no account of those who had passed that period, no account of those who were not in the full possession of all their faculties; and that struggle is going on in this country to-day. There are private manufacturers, scores and hundreds and thousands of them, who care nothing about the men who produce their wealth. There are a great many manufacturers in this country who have no interest in the men or the women or the children whom they employ.

I am glad to admit, and glad to be able to state, that that particular class of manufacturers is rapidly falling into the minority in this country. I think the great bulk of the manufacturers of this country do take an interest in the people who work for them. They are enlightened to such an extent that they know that to a greater or less extent the well-being of those who work for them is their well-being; but I am convinced that if it were possible to introduce in a majority of the manufacturing establishments of the United States this system known as the Taylor efficiency system, which subordinates every consideration to the consideration of making dividends, the condition of the working people of the United States would be that of virtual slavery, and instead of the whiplash there would be the goad of striving to make money enough to feed and clothe those dependent upon the employee.

When the Sage Foundation made their investigation of conditions existing in the city of Pittsburgh—and I am not trying to get a rise out of the senior or the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, but simply stating a fact with which they are undoubtedly as familiar as I am—they found that in that great center of population, with immigration from all quarters of the world pouring in, the rate of wages in many lines of industry was based upon the ability of the single man in lodgings to support life. It seems to me that so far as the combination of wages and effort is concerned, you do not need any Taylor efficiency system to get any better results from the manufacturer's standpoint than that—the rate of wages at which the single man in lodgings was able to support life. The industrial conditions in certain lines in that city were such that no man dared to get married; that no man was able to support a helpless or aged parent or an infirm sister or brother. A sick relative, or sickness existing in his own case, or any one of the thousands of things that you and I know are likely to happen to any man at any hour or any minute of the day, threw that man as a factor out of the industrial life of that great city.

I am against this proposition, root and branch. I am one of those who believe with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who a day or two ago said that for some time to come he expected to be sympathetic and lend a favorable ear to the claims and demands of the laboring people of this country, citing the figures which showed the average wages received by the laboring people of the United States. The strongest indictment that can be drawn against this great Government of ours is the indictment that can be drawn with reference to its treatment of its laboring people.

Look at Germany, look and England and France and the other great nations of the world, the attempts that are being made, the time and thought and patient study the statesmen of those nations are giving to the welfare and well-being of their people, and contrast it with the few petty, futile little things that we consider for them in bodies like this in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is interesting. Does the Senator from New Jersey mean to say that the laboring men of Germany and England are better off than those in this country?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator knows me better than to think I would make any statement like that on an occasion of this kind. I will say this, though, and I think the Senator is bound to admit it—and I am not going to make any statement which is going to give rise to a tariff controversy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. HUGHES. But I say, as I said before, and I think the Senator will admit, that the various European Governments do much more as Governments for their people than our Government does for our people. The Senator has not heard of any old-age pension bills being introduced in this or any other legislative body, I am sure; and yet the Senator knows that there are old-age pension systems in force in various European countries. The Senator has not heard of any national insurance systems being put into effect here, the object being to indemnify the common laboring people of the country against sickness and death and accident; and yet he knows that there are such systems in various European countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true, and those matters are being agitated more or less in this country at the present time, but my opinion, though it may not be worth much, is that our people do not need those helps as they are needed in European countries.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator may be right about that. I am sure I hope he is. I think, however, the statement I made a while ago can not be controverted, namely, that the National Government of the United States does less directly for, pays less attention, and gives less consideration as a Government to, its laboring people than any civilized country in the world; and now here we are debating this proposition!

I venture to say that not one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the manufacturers of the United States would put this system into effect in their factories. For humanitarian reasons alone I believe they never will get a much greater percentage than that. I do not think they can get a higher percentage than that of manufacturers in this country who regard the people who labor for them, the people who help them create their wealth, simply as so much raw material to be used when the occasion requires it, and then to be discarded.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, surely the Senator does not look upon the employers of labor in that light, as being men who look upon the laboring men merely as raw material?

Mr. HUGHES. I have said that. That is just exactly what I said.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am seeking information from the Senator from New Jersey, who knows much more about this subject than I do; but I know there are establishments in New England which treat their employees with the greatest possible consideration, and in which there never has been a strike, which have written me in favor of striking out this provision in the bill. I confess to a great deal of ignorance on the matter myself, and I am seeking enlightenment. I want to do what is right in reference to the matter as between the employer and the employee, which I have always tried to do. No matter what other people may have thought of my words or my votes, that has been my purpose. I may not have accomplished much, but I have tried to do that.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not any doubt of that. Surely nothing I said would lead the Senator to think I made any contrary statement.

There is a tremendous propaganda going on in favor of this Taylor system. I have no doubt the National Manufacturers' Association takes a deep and active interest in that system. I have no doubt that there is a considerable number of manufacturers who believe that their interests are wrapped up in the interests of the men who are in favor of this system—men who, like the Senator, have not given very much study to it, do not understand the details of it, and have not a clear idea of what the conclusion is bound to be if such a system could be put into effect in a majority of the manufacturing establishments of the United States, which I here predict is absolutely and utterly impossible. You might have done it in Russia at one period of its history; you might have done it in China; but, in my judgment, it never has been possible and it never will be possible to do it in the United States of America.

The point I am trying to make, however, is this: I am against the Taylor system. The laboring people of the country, those of them who understand it, are uniformly and almost without an exception against it. I think the principle involved in it is bad, whether you seek to enforce it by means of the Taylor or any other system.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Jersey how he accounts for the fact that the workmen of the Frankford Arsenal, to whom this amendment is directed, and who ought to know what the effect upon them is, appear here opposed to the amendment and in favor of the system as applied to the Frankford Arsenal?

Mr. HUGHES. I will explain that to the Senator. There is nothing new about that. I will say to the Senator there never has been a time when an employer or foreman or superintendent of a factory could not get signatures to a petition. This letter is signed by three or four girls whose wages range from $1.60 to $2 a day, and they pretended to speak for five or six hundred highly paid mechanics in the Frankford Arsenal.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. Do I understand the Senator from New Jersey to say that the statements of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] in regard to this matter are absolutely incorrect? He is represented as saying that personally he knows some 400 people there——

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think the Senator made any such statement as that.

Mr. LIPPITT. It may be that I misunderstood him.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has the petition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to say to the Senator that there is a petition signed by some 300 or 400, although I have never counted them. I have the petition in my hand.

Mr. ROOT. I can not hear the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say that the committee when it acted on this matter had before it the petition signed by 300 or 400 employees of the Frankford Arsenal. I have not counted the number, but they must run up to about that.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator it has been stated in the House hearings on various occasions that gentlemen in favor of installing this system have used coercive measures to get the employees to sign a petition saying that they were in favor of something they were not in favor of. When this petition was filed and the employers of the Frankford Arsenal understood that it was afoot they met and adopted a resolution which I understand the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is in possession of in favor of the House provision. At least I was so informed by the secretary of the Senator this morning, and I assume at some period of the debate the Senator will put in that petition.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, as I have already stated, I am in receipt of several hundred communications on both sides of this question. I hold in my hand two samples of communications, of which I received several hundred sent separately through the mail. I took it that there could not be a great amount of coercion in these epistles. I will read what one of them says. I want it understood that I am not speaking against this amendment. I am seeking light and information. If the Senator will permit me to read it, it says:

THE FRANKFORD ARSENAL ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., January 28, 1915.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The committee named below, representing 400 employees of the Frankford Arsenal, earnestly protest against the legislation in the Army bill depriving us of our premium rate of compensation, which was established at this arsenal over five years ago to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned. The enactment of this legislation means an annual loss to us of about $44,972. You are requested to use your utmost endeavors to have this legislation struck out by the upper House of Congress or so modified that we will not be deprived of our increased earnings under the premium system.

Then, also under a separate cover, together with 500 other communications, a committee of women employees of the Frankford Arsenal have requested my "assistance in an endeavor to correct a hardship placed upon them by the proviso in the Army appropriation bill now before the Senate for action." They say:

Inclosed find typewritten copy of the same. In their behalf I appeal to you for your assistance and investigation of their grievance. The proviso affecting the arsenal employees, if enacted into law, will be a positive hardship upon the skilled and machine-operating men and women employees. The rate of wages put into effect last Monday, through orders issued by Gen. Crozier, are to the effect that machine operators making cartridge shells, their wages will be reduced to $1.20 and $1.16 per day, respectively, thus denying to them an increase of their daily wage earnings by constant application to their work of at least 25 to 60 cents per day. The piecework as heretofore in vogue is to be discontinued, thus very materially reducing their earnings.

They suggest that if a rate of wages per day is to be adhered to, that a sum of $1.52 be paid per diem to the machine operators and a proportionate increase to the skilled employees, thus equalizing the wage question and granting to them at least a living amount of wages.

I have taken this liberty of acquainting you with their protest and request, believing that you will give this matter your attention, as this condition affects in the neighborhood of 500 employees, mostly residents of the Frankford district.

Thanking you in their behalf for any assistance you may render, and wishing you continued success.

That is a sample of many hundreds which I have received through the mails separately against this amendment. I only read it for the information of the Senate and the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. I understood the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean against the Senate amendment? I so understood the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, to be entirely fair with the Senator, I have a copy of a communication from Washington, from Thomas B. Carroll, general organizer, stating that these communications were sent under more or less influence and duress. That is the situation, as far as I know.

Mr. HUGHES. I saw the statement in the House hearings, I recollect, in which it was pointed out that of 12 men who had taken some action, such as coming down to Washington to complain of this system, 5 of them had been dropped from the service. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that these gentlemen want the Taylor efficiency system installed, and they are ready to go to any reasonable length to get it installed. They think they are doing a good thing, and they do it in a mild way; but they adopt coercive measures toward these people. They frighten them and adopt measures that are worse than we understand ordinarily when we speak of coercive measures. They frighten them by threatening them that they will receive less wages than they are now receiving if they do not fall in line with the management. So far as this proposition is concerned, they point out to them that the first thing that will happen will be that they will lose their bonuses, which, of course, means a practical reduction of salary for them, although nobody has any objection to adopting a piecework system at these plants. It is quite within the power of the gentlemen who have submitted these communications to put these other people on a piecework basis and pay them so much for each piece they produce. That is entirely different from the bonus of a premium system, and is perfectly satisfactory to everybody concerned, because it gives the Government a fair return for a fair day's wage. There is no difficulty involved. The best manufacturers in the United States do not have this system and are able to protect themselves.

I noticed in the hearings that the Government was manufacturing various products, tools, and implements at a cost of one-third and one-fourth and as low as one-fifth of the market price in addition to having a short work day and paying fair wages.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly, but I was rather interested in his last remark that he has no objection to the work being done by the piece.

Mr. HUGHES. No; I have not.

Mr. LIPPITT. But that he does object to the provision in this bill by which a premium bonus is to be paid for good work.

Mr. HUGHES. Not for good work; for fast work.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, a premium for piecework. The whole basis of piecework, of course, is a premium paid to the employee who can do the most work. He gets off 10 pieces and he gets one price, and he gets off 5 pieces and gets one-half that price.

Mr. HUGHES. But the premium system is entirely different from that.

Mr. LIPPITT. The premium system, I understand, is based upon establishing a minimum wage.

Mr. HUGHES. I will read the premium system, which is very interesting. I will read it for the benefit of the Senator. I do not think he clearly understands it or I do not think he would be in favor of this proposition.

For example, a workman has been doing a piece of work in 190 minutes. After painstaking study of the job and of all the means of saving time the man is carefully instructed as to these means and is told that for every minute saved within, say, 120 minutes—

Now, they have taken 70 minutes off this. He has been doing a job in 190 minutes, and they are going to say the minimum is 120 minutes. We have watched your work, we have followed you through your daily operations, we know how many steps you take going from this pile to that pile, we know how long it takes you to stop to pick something up and bring it to a certain place. We have done all that and know more about it than you do. You have been taking 190 minutes to do this. You must start at 120 minutes, and as an inducement to you all the time you save under 120 minutes you will be compensated for at the following increased rate.

Mr. LIPPITT. How much is the Senator reading and how much is he interpolating? I would be very glad to have the Senator read it, but he is interpolating so much that I do not really know what he is reading.

Mr. HUGHES. I will read it and give the quotation marks.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask what the Senator is reading from?

Mr. HUGHES. I am reading a quotation from Mr. Taylor's pamphlet on the subject of shop management, the very question involved here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the Senator reading from Mr. Taylor's pamphlet or is he reading from a document?

Mr. HUGHES. It is taken from the report of the Committee on Education and Labor by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A Senate document?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; a Senate document.

Mr. LIPPITT. What is the number of the document?

Mr. HUGHES. Report No. 1175, Sixty-third Congress, second session. I will just quote it straight throughout:

For example, a workman has been doing a piece of work in 190 minutes. After painstaking study of the job and all the means of saving time, the man is carefully instructed as to these means, and is told that for every minute saved, within, say, 120 minutes, he will be paid for half a minute at his regular rate, in addition to his regular daily pay; and that it is thought that he can do the work in 72 minutes, for which time the increase over his regular pay will amount to 33⅓ per cent.

So here is a man who has been doing a certain amount of work in 190 minutes under the Taylor efficiency system.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think that the advertisement and the somewhat boastful statement that Mr. Taylor and the supporters of his system have made in order to induce people to adopt it ought to be taken as a foundation for legislation on the important subject of rewarding working people for efficiency. Mr. Taylor, as I understand it, is an enthusiast upon a certain method that he has devised for improving the efficiency of the working people. Now, improving the efficiency of the working people is a very important subject. It is a very important subject from the standpoint of the workingman. It is simply another name for education. It is also a very important subject from the standpoint of the community at large, who are entitled to have their work performed as efficiently as possible. It does include, as the Senator from New Jersey has been pointing out, certain possibilities of oppression, and of course every decent man wants to guard against that side of the subject. On the other hand, every progressive man must be in favor of improvements in mechanical and commercial methods, and those improvements would be favored whether they consist of mechanical improvements in machinery, in devising new attachments, or in radical changes in the principle of machines, or whether they consist in showing men how to be more efficient and in rewarding men for efficiency.

The essence of this system, as I understand it, is simply that it is an attempt to give to the efficient man a little higher reward than the inefficient man gets. So if that is the principle, and that is the way I understand it, I am in favor of that principle and I do not want to see anything done that will break it down.

That statement of Mr. Taylor in regard to his system is somewhat an exaggerated advertisement of it, it seems to me. Mr. Taylor's system has not been generally adopted in manufacturing establishments, but the principle on which the Taylor system is established is as old as are manufacturing establishments.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I agree in the main with everything the Senator from Rhode Island has said, but I think he is in error when he states that there is no attempt to adopt the Taylor system as a whole in manufacturing establishments. There has been an attempt, a fairly successful attempt, in some places, and a very strong effort is being made to get it into the Government establishments. There is absolutely no excuse for a bonus system or a premium system of this character, which I understand is the character of a premium system that is in vogue, unless it is intended finally to adopt the Taylor system. It has no place in any manufacturing establishment which does not intend to go the whole way. In my judgment, these gentlemen intend to go the whole way, and it is my purpose and the purpose of the legislation which came over in the House bill to prevent it.

The Senator is a manufacturer and knows how to determine the efficiency of men. I want to call his attention to the system that is now in effect in the Watertown Arsenal. I do not know whether the Senator was here when I referred to it before or not, but they have a most comprehensive, complex, and intricate method of determining the daily and monthly and annual efficiency of the employees of that institution. There is absolutely nothing left to chance. There is not the slightest difficulty in any ordinarily intelligent man knowing just who are the efficient men in the establishment.

I will quote from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, No. 403.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just at that point?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly, and I feel almost as though I ought to apologize for the extent to which I have gone into it, but what this bill says is—

> Nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages.

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly. They can raise his wages.

Mr. LIPPITT. That is the broadest possible negation of the right of the Government to reward skill and industry. It is not limited in any possible way. It says, in effect, it shall be the principle of the Government of the United States that no workingman, however efficient he may be or however skillful he may be, shall receive any reward for that efficiency. I can not conceive that to be a good principle for this Government to adopt. It says nothing about the Taylor system.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator knows very well that he does not pay a bonus in his own plant. Without knowing anything about it, I venture to say the Senator pays no bonus in his own plant. He is believed to be a humanitarian employer, and I will venture to say that he pays no bonuses or premiums in the plant with which he is connected or in which he is interested. He may have a profit-sharing plan, he may give certain men a certain profit.

Mr. LIPPITT. In the industry with which I happen to be engaged, in textile manufacture, we have the piecework plan, not that there is any difference——

Mr. HUGHES. There may be a head of a department here and there——

Mr. LIPPITT. Not that there is any difference between a piecework plan and a bonus plan in principle.

Mr. HUGHES. There is a great difference.

Mr. LIPPITT. That is something I am not able to understand.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not in favor of piecework. I know it is the tendency of piecework to reduce wages and to crowd production. I know the tendency of the work is to produce more and pay less, because it does not always continue the same character of work. The job changes and a new price has to be set. A new day's work has to be estimated. It is the gradual tendency of piecework to increase production and lower wages. I know that, but piecework, bad as it is, is infinitely preferable to this iniquitous bonus or premium system.

I want to quote now from the committee of the House of Representatives, No. 403, Sixty-second Congress, second session, a report made by the present Secretary of Labor and concurred in by William C. Redfield, now the Secretary of Commerce, and John Q. Tilson, then a Representative, a Representative-elect now from the State of Connecticut.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention was attracted to a statement by the Senator condemning piecework. Is the Senator opposed to piecework as a principle?

Mr. HUGHES. As against this proposition I am in favor of it; but I will say to the Senator the theory that a man who does the most work gets the most money under the piecework system sounds beautiful, but my experience has been that it does not work out well. The net result of it is that, as under the Taylor system, the day's work is finally based upon the ability of the high-class man. The man does not get any more in the end; his wages are finally driven down. The only difference is that he is doing more work for the same wages and the people under him on the piecework system, not so skillful as he, do not get enough on which to live. That is the practical operation of the piecework system. I have seen it a thousand times; and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. GALLINGER. Doubtless the Senator knows infinitely more about that than I do; but we have piecework in the Government Printing Office here.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator opposed to that?

Mr. HUGHES. No, sir; the piecework system, as operated in the Government Printing Office, works all right. The piecework system could be made to work all right if every employer was as beneficent as an employer as is the Government and as I want it to continue to be as an employer. In this instance I would have no objection to the piecework system; I am asking for it in preference to the premium or bonus system. I want them to put it in operation at this plant, rather than the system which is sought to be put into operation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not follow the Senator from New Jersey. We all remember the old gentleman in Maine who was "for the prohibitory law, but 'agin' its enforcement." I do not understand how the Senator squares himself with the declaration that he is against the piecework system, and yet is for the piecework system.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not misunderstand me. I will try to state my position over again. I will suggest to the Senator, as a matter of personal experience, that the best system under which working people can work—and I am not talking about the manufacturers, the owners of plants, the men who are in business frankly for the purpose of making money and producing dividends—but, so far as the laboring people are concerned, the best system is the system which this committee reported in favor of, and which I was about to read when the Senator interrupted me. With his permission, I will now read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. It is as follows:

> Ordinary intelligent management under any system could eliminate it entirely, or at least reduce it to the point where it would not be a serious hindrance to production. Because there are some loafers is no reason why the remainder of the workmen should either be compelled or induced to work up to the very edge of the breaking strain. There is need for production at the lowest cost, but no economic necessity can justify requiring workmen to speed up to the highest point which they can continue from day to day and from year to year, even without injury to their health and strength. To place workmen in a position of that kind is to put them in the position of a beast of burden which is required to go on from day to day performing a given task.

Stop-watch time study should not be made of workmen without their consent, or any conditions be imposed upon them by authority which imply any indignity; piecework may be introduced where the work to be performed is a continuous duplication, but with the express understanding that piecework rates shall not be cut unless the conditions of production are materially changed.

That is the difficulty all the time. The conditions of production are materially changing. Very seldom is a man engaged on work which is work of continuous duplication. Every time a change is made advantage is taken of the stimulating effect of the piecework system with the man. He has disclosed himself as being able to do a certain amount of work, and advantage is taken of that fact. When the next day's job is started his maximum is taken as his minimum. As I said to the Senator, in ordinary industrial affairs the piecework system is a bad system for the man who toils. This committee goes on and says:

In other cases the rate should be a straight day-wage rate at the highest prevailing rate for a similar class of work in the neighborhood where the Government work is to be performed, except that by mutual consent bonus and premium work may be introduced.

The situation pictured by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] need not affect the mind of any Senator here, because it is quite possible to meet the wishes of the parties concerned in this matter. A piecework system can be established, which will give to those people who have petitioned the Senator precisely the same rate of wages which they are now receiving for the same amount of production. So what difficulty is there involved? We will establish a system and we will put an end to this continuous effort on the part of the officers at the various arsenals and navy yards, who have not as much sympathy as perhaps they might have with the civilians there employed and treat them as the hardest-hearted manufacturers in the United States treat their employees.

I ask the Senate, in all seriousness, to let the House language stand in the bill. It only applies to this appropriation bill; it will only be a law during the life of the bill, until July, 1916. In the meantime the Senate will have an opportunity to make further investigation, if it so desires, and, in the end, I hope Congress will enact substantive legislation which will prevent the recurrence of these discussions.

Mr. OLIVER and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] in the course of his address made some remarks about wages in the Pittsburgh district, which I feel I can not allow to pass without something in the nature of a reply.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Pennsylvania does not understand me as personally making that statement? The Senator is as familiar with the work of the Sage Foundation Commission as I can be. I saw the statement in a Philadelphia publication.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand, Mr. President, that the Senator referred to the report of the Pittsburgh survey made by the Sage Foundation, and did not state it as either of his own knowledge or as his belief, except as based upon that publication.

I have read that rather extraordinary report, Mr. President, though I had temporarily forgotten that it contained what he said about wages. In fact, I do not now recollect to have seen that particular statement in it; but I have no doubt it is there, as the Senator from New Jersey says so.

The report of the Pittsburgh survey made by the Sage Foundation was made in the very earliest days of that foundation. It is based on information gleaned by a lot of inexperienced young people entirely unfitted for their work, and is brimful of the grossest kind of inaccuracies.

With regard to the statement referred to by the Senator from New Jersey, that wages in the industrial establishments of Pittsburgh are based upon the lowest amount that one man, living in lodgings, can live on, I say that if that statement is contained in that report it is absolutely and entirely untrue.

Mr. President, I am not here to defend the present wage system. In competitive business men will pay for a certain kind of work the wages their competitors pay, and no more; and so long as selfishness is the guiding principle of human life every man will get as much work as he can for as little money as he can, but that the manufacturers in the industries of Pittsburgh get more work out of their men for less money than manufacturers in any like industries in other sections of the country I say is not true.

I say further—and I say it without fear of contradiction—that in no industrial district in the United States or in the world are higher wages paid for like work than are paid in the great industrial center in which I live. The only exception I will allow to that statement is that, perhaps, in some of the mining regions of the West, where living is extraordinarily high, higher wages are naturally paid than in the East, where it does not cost so much to live. The truth of my statement is proved and will be plain to anybody who visits the district and will examine into the matter and ascertain the facts concerning the immense and constantly growing deposits in our savings banks, the amounts being deposited in the postal savings bank in that district, the enormous sums of money that are daily remitted to the countries of eastern Europe by these men who, as it is said, only receive for their labor enough wages to keep them alive from day to day.

I can not stand here, Mr. President, and hear the great community which has given me a home since my infancy slandered in this way. The masters of industry in Pittsburgh pay just as much for like work as the same kind of employers pay in any other part of the country, and infinitely more than is paid in any part of the world outside of the United States.

Before I sit down I want to refer in a very few words to another matter connected with this proposed legislation. I am informed by the employees of the Frankford Arsenal that—

The premium system was introduced about five years ago, and the tasks were assigned to the men and women without any supervision by a time watch, as such time study has never been introduced in the arsenal. The capacity of the various machines was known, and it was not difficult to assign a task which would be fair to the employee and fair to the Government.

Your attention is particularly invited to the fact that the task for a day was based upon seven hours' running of the machine, leaving to the employee one hour of the eight for washing, relaxation, going to the toilet, etc. In other words, out of every hour 15 minutes were given to each employee. The employee's task was therefore under such circumstances fixed at seven-eighths of the capacity of the machine, which practically amounts to making the working day one of seven hours instead of eight.

In other words, Mr. President, as practiced in this particular arsenal, the capacity of the machine is fixed at what it will normally and naturally do in seven hours. Any employee working eight hours and producing seven hours' work is given his or her day's wages, and for anything more than that task which they can produce from this machine they are paid one-half of the proportion of the day's work. It is a system that satisfies them all. They want it continued. They are using the extra wages they obtain in this way to pay for the little homes which they have bought and to procure for themselves better means of living. The opposition does not come from inside the arsenal; it comes from the outside.

Now, one word more. Mr. President, in my life I have given some study and thought to the question of differences between employer and employee. I have been an employer of labor myself; I have had differences with the men whom I employed; and as a result of my experience and observation I want to say that the differences between employer and employee, as a general thing, are usually traceable to two unreasonable kinds of men—on the one side, the employer whose sole object is to get as much out of his men for as little as he can and, on the other side, the workman who seeks to give as little in the way of labor for as much money as he can get. If you could eliminate these two classes labor difficulties would be very rare. I am glad to say that, with greater study, with greater intelligence, and with a more liberal spirit throughout the land and throughout the world, the unreasonable employer is fast disappearing. I fear not that the unreasonable employee is coming to the front, but I fear, to be perfectly plain, that the efforts of some of the great labor organizations are rather in the direction of encouraging the unreasonable employee than of inciting him to give a reasonable amount of day's labor for a reasonable compensation in the shape of day's wages.

Now, it seems to me that this system specifying a reasonable amount—and I do not believe that anybody will charge that the superintendents of the Government arsenals will be unreasonable in fixing tasks for a machine—I think that this system by which a given task is set for a machine so that seven hours' reasonable work can be done in eight hours and offering an inducement to the industrious and skillful and efficient workman to work up above that by paying him a bonus for his extra work is so reasonable that I feel if I were to vote against such a proposition I would be recreant to my duty as a representative of my State.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I feel somewhat like apologizing to the Senate for taking up any more of its time in the discussion of this bill; but inasmuch as I am one of the members of the committee who voted to strike out the provision, I think it my duty to give the Senate some of the reasons which actuated me in so doing.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs I voted to strike out this proviso, primarily because I do not think it has any legitimate place in the bill. The fact that its consideration has exhausted more than a day of our valuable time should be a conclusive illustration of the soundness of this objection. Shortly after I entered the Senate the President vetoed the sundry civil bill for the sole reason that it contained a proviso of similar character, forbidding the use of any moneys appropriated in that measure for the prosecution of any labor or farmers' organization under the antitrust acts. The succeeding bill contained the same proviso, and the President approved that bill, notwithstanding his expressed disapproval of the proviso itself.

Mr. SMOOT. That was another President, however.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. This illustrated, to my mind, the vicious nature of provisos or riders or additions to measures designed for other or general purposes so vividly that I have, in so far as my committee work was concerned, voted to eliminate similar provisions wherever they occur.

If it be true that all of the injurious results that have been detailed must follow from the establishment of the so-called efficiency system in Government operations, then it is of sufficient importance to be made the subject of a bill dealing solely with that proposition. We can then discuss it upon its merits, and without reference to its effect or its influence upon matters which, as in the present instance, are directly associated with it, and which may stand or fall upon the opinion of Congress and the President with regard to that one provision. That is not right, Mr. President. The Army bill is a great supply bill. The purpose of it is to equip the War Department for the ensuing year, without reference to differences of opinion as to whether it goes too far or not far enough. This industrial question is injected into it and made a part of it, which necessarily distracts very largely from the consideration of the merits of the principal measure. It is a custom sanctified by age and made respectable by usage, but it is nevertheless one which ought to be corrected whenever possible, and objected to wherever an objection can be entertained against it.

I therefore voted against it as a piece of proposed legislation foreign to the general subject matter of the bill, one designed to distract attention, and which has distracted attention in its ultimate consideration from the merits of the measure itself.

Another of my reasons was that those who are affected by the proviso appealed to the Senate committee to strike it out. I think that the views of those who come under the influence of, or are affected by, the provisions of a given law, especially if they express themselves with any unanimity, ought to know something about its operation. It is they to whom we should look for the purpose of determining whether, in its operation, it has produced the evil effects which it is declared are inseparable from the system or whether it has had the opposite result.

I do not recall that any written protest against the practice was laid before the committee during its consideration. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] appeared, asking to be heard in behalf of some of his constituents who desired to see the proviso stricken out. The discussion which followed made it unnecessary for him to go to that trouble, as the committee, or at least a majority of those present, felt that the proviso should be stricken out, among others, for the reasons stated.

I believe thoroughly in the doctrine of efficiency. I am aware of the fact that a system baptized by that name may be put to an untoward or an injurious purpose, just as any other system or any other scheme of legislation may be. On the other hand, without efficiency there can be no such thing as progress; and if efficiency is to be tabooed, especially in the line of Government operation, why should we educate our children? The ambition of every man is to give his child a better position in the world than has been afforded himself—a laudable ambition, a noble ambition, the ambition upon which our educational system is founded, one which has been productive of the most marvelously beneficial results, and which constitutes the foundation of our growth and of our progress. We ought to be able, therefore, to guard against the abuse of any system if it contains elements of inestimable value to our community life as well as to our individual life without discarding the system itself, and I think that can be done.

If it can be shown to me that a superintendent of any of our governmental institutions is using what is called the efficiency system for the purpose of speeding up men unduly, for the purpose of weeding out those who are unable to meet the strain placed upon them by their increasing tasks, or is using it even unconsciously toward the end which it is claimed it must surely reach, I would be one of the first to demand the removal either of the system or of the superintendent, or possibly of both. Until that is made to appear, however, I do not believe the Congress of the United States should set its seal of disapproval upon a system which, so far as it has been carried, seems to have been successful, to have commanded the applause and the support of those who work and carry on their operations under it, and who seem to have so far benefited financially from its operation as to be able, by their increased income, to secure sufficient savings to begin the purchase of a home.

If I remember the petitions correctly some of the signers are in that very interesting period between the attempted acquisition of a home and its final payment, a position, Mr. President, in which all the apprehensions of a man who is dependent upon his daily labor are naturally aroused and who will strain every effort to see to it that the home is secured during the period of time given for its payment.

Now, if that is the condition of many of those people it is fair to assume that this same condition exists among the workmen in our other arsenals and Government manufactories, for if it were not, we would have been apprised of the circumstances before final action was taken upon this matter.

When, therefore, Mr. President, with a unanimity of request that is remarkable—I will not say unusual, but it is really remarkable—the employees of one of these great institutions protest against this measure and request Congress to continue its operation, it seems to me it is our duty to do so. It is very easy to appoint a committee or to have the Secretary of War through appropriate agencies inquire into and investigate any charge of oppression, of injustice, and of wrong which may at any time be the outgrowth or which may be suspected to be the outgrowth of the operation of this system.

I can not speak at large but as far as my knowledge goes of Government employees and officials they are not an overworked body of men and women. They are the best paid employees among all who work for their living in the United States. Their hours are shorter. Many of them have combined into organizations some of which are strong enough to enable them to make not only requests but demands for certain legislation or protests against legislation which they do not desire.

Until we are informed at least by hearsay of the alleged pernicious results of this system as applied to the arsenals or other institutions which are under the control of the Department of War, I think we should go upon the testimony laid before us and strike out this provision.

Something has been said, Mr. President, about the mechanical features of the system. It is declared that men are subject to be timed in a most arbitrary and unjust manner and their work speeded up and paid for upon the basis of efficiency of the highest as shown during the period of these arbitrary intervals. Such a system may be an unwise and an unjust one. No man likes to be held to the fraction of a second in the performance of any task. I am inclined to think that if a stop watch was held upon the Members of the United States Senate, especially during a period of active or obstructive debate, there would be a greater protest against it than will ever arise from a labor union. Hence I will not assume that there is any particular danger of attaching this stop-watch system to the body to which I have the honor to belong.

But if it be true, Mr. President, that these incidents of an efficiency system are obnoxious or injurious, I can not doubt that the authorities will see that they are either corrected or done away with. Until something of that kind appears I do not think the Government of the United States can afford to interfere with an efficiency system which is in process of experiment, and which, so far as the experience of those affected by that process are concerned, seems to have been both beneficial and satisfactory.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this House provision, which the committee of the Senate proposes to strike out, contains two very distinct propositions, one prohibiting the stop watch or other time-measuring device and the other prohibiting bonuses. They are so distinct that I think the amendment ought to be divided, and at the proper time I shall ask that it be divided.

Mr. WARREN. May I call the Senator's attention also to the first part of the proposed proviso, which penalizes a foreman, a superintendent, and so forth? As they are officers of the Army commissioned and under the discipline of the Army, does not the Senator think that that also should be separated?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. In the naval appropriation bill there is a similar provision, but it does not contain this provision about the officers, and it can be taken out here perfectly well.

Mr. President, I have received scores of letters against the House provision, both in the Navy and the Army bills. They are all, without exception, from employers of labor. I have received very little from the men who labor—from the employed. I have received one or two letters from those not employed in the arsenal and this letter from the men employed in the arsenal at Watertown:

23 CHARLES STREET,
Auburndale, Mass., February 16, 1915.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LODGE: We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Massachusetts and the representatives of the employees in the different departments at the Watertown Arsenal, under the War Department, respectfully urge upon you, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, and through you the Senate of the United States, to support the clause on page 50 of this year's naval appropriation bill which aims to curb the objectionable features of the "Taylor system of shop management" and similar systems by prohibiting the time study of workmen and the premium system in Government shops.

We further urge you to support an amendment of the clause that will give it the effect of permanent law.

Woodworking department, E. P. Gingras.
Pattern-making department, James B. Cummings.
Paint department, H. A. Gildersleeve.
Foundry department, J. R. Cooney.

Yard laboring, P. Killride.

Yours, respectfully,

MAURICE W. BOWEN,
Chairman Representative Committee.

Those men are men of good standing in their communities, as well as in the arsenal, and I think their views are entitled to the same consideration as the views of employers outside.

The subject was new to me. I have never been an employer of labor, nor have I ever been employed in any of the industries, and I look at it entirely from an outside point of view.

About the system of bonuses instead of a straight system of piecework I am not able to speak with any confidence. I have not made up my mind; I do not know enough about it. I think the piecework system, which is largely used both in private establishments and also in Government departments, is a fair system. However it has worked, it is certainly a fair system in theory, for I believe the better man, the man of self-control, the man of sobriety, the man of industry, the man of thrift, the man of skill, is entitled to the higher wages which those qualities give him.

But the first proposition about the time measure, the holding of the stop watch over a man, I can not accept. It seems to me false economically, and I do not believe that in the long run it will lead to any good results.

The one object of the time measure is to produce speed. Now, speed is not the only thing that the Government or any other employer or manufacturer is seeking for. There is something more important than speed, and that is quality. Speed has nothing to do with quality. Owing to the great inventions of our time, owing to steam and electricity, we have carried speed to such an extent in all our manufactures that certainly in many cases the product has deteriorated in quality as it has advanced in quantity and rapidity of production.

The stop watch and the time measure can tell you nothing whatever about quality. It may be a basis of fixing wages or anything else, but the only thing they can possibly tell on time is speed. We all associate a stop watch with its use for racing horses. I dare say it is used now for racing automobiles, but not by a man buying horses for his ordinary use. In the days before automobiles I used to own horses and be very fond of them and drove them a great deal, but I never put a stop watch on a horse that I was trying to buy. I wanted to know his quality; I wanted to try him; but I was not going to buy a horse to use on the track, and therefore I had no use for the stop watch. They use the stop watch to test a horse who is going on the track to race in the Derby, for instance, or in any of our great races. It is of the utmost importance to know what that horse can do on the furlong or on the quarter mile or on the half mile, but it does not tell the story of his quality. It will tell the story of speed and the qualities necessary to speed, but there are many qualities it does not tell.

Now, to apply the stop watch to human beings may tell how fast they can work, but it can tell nothing of the quality of their work.

Mr. POMERENE. Nor how long they may work.

Mr. LODGE. Nor how long they may work. A horse may be very good for a short spurt and absolutely worthless for a 4-mile race. It is a poor test. It is a promoter of the idea that the one thing to do is to turn out just as much as we can just as fast as we can. That has gone through everything in this period of ours. It has deteriorated style, it has deteriorated literature, it has deteriorated art. It is deteriorating manufacture.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am seeking information on this point. I had supposed the quality of the work was fairly well standardized; that is, that this speed system, or whatever you call it, was for the purpose of producing a greater amount of a given quality, of a certain kind. I suppose all the work is subject to inspection.

Mr. LODGE. That may be all true; but I do not think it affects the argument I am trying to make, and that is that speed is neither a test of a man's capacity nor a test of the quality of the work he will turn out. It is merely speed; it is merely quantity.

Look back over the history of any of the great arts. For instance, there was a Venetian painter, Luca Giordano. He was known popularly as Luca Fa Presto, because he worked so fast; he covered acres of walls and acres of canvas with pictures of a certain technical cleverness. But one Madonna painted by Bellini outweighs them all to-day in price, in beauty, and in every quality. But under the stop-watch system nobody would have employed Bellini; they would all have employed Luca Giordano.

Mr. President, may I take one more illustration from the art of painting? The total production of Rubens is something enormous. The mere quantity, the opulence and fertility of his inventions, and his capacity for work are in themselves great qualities. He painted many very great and splendid pictures, and yet Leonardo Da Vinci, all of whose pictures can be put in a small room, painted one which was stolen from the Louvre the other day, and that alone will outweigh the whole of Rubens's productions, and Rubens was a very great painter too.

It is the same way with books. When I was a boy—and I suppose there are some still here old enough to remember that period—there were two very popular writers, Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth and Ned Buntline, who poured out countless books. They had the highest possible speed and wonderful facility, but three or four novels of Hawthorne are a possession of literature to-day and the others have vanished. Speed is not the only thing in art or literature, and it is not the only thing in manufacturing. There quality is needed too.

I do not believe, Mr. President, in a system of standing over men with stop watches to see how far they can go under pressure in securing speed, in performing a given piece of work. The very fact of a stop watch implies strain on every faculty, on every physical power, driving the heart and lungs and every muscle to the utmost possible point.

In the days of slavery it was said there was one school of slave owners who believed it was more profitable to work the slaves to the last possible point and let them die than to try and care for them when they were ill and work them reasonable hours and treat them without a stop watch. Those who believed in working them to death, I imagine, were a very small and merciless minority, but there is always that disposition.

I am a thorough believer in the best man getting the best wage and the hard-working man getting what his hard work deserves. I have no desire to see the thriftless and the idle paid as well as the industrious, steady, and hard-working men, but I do not believe anything is gained for the Government or for anybody else in standing over a man with a stop watch to see whether under pressure he can do a certain piece of work in a given time. I do not believe it is sound economy.

The result of this is that all your Government shops are in constant agitation. It does not seem to be any answer to say that union labor is opposed to this system. That is only putting it off one step. It does not follow that because union labor is opposed to it it must be good. The men are restless for whatever reason; there is incessant agitation; they resist; they object to it; they do not think it is fair.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not think in the argument which he has just made he has overlooked the mechanical facilities of the individual. I think a great deal in all these things depends upon the mechanical property, the use of the hands, which some people possess to a very high degree and others do not. An illustration of that is found in the ordinary operation of sewing. A fast sewer is usually a good sewer, whereas a poor sewer is very slow and makes a bungling performance at last.

Mr. LODGE. It does not prove because persons work slowly that they work badly.

Mr. DU PONT. Not always.

Mr. LODGE. As a rule, some of the best work in the world and the most enduring has been done slowly. That does not follow any more than it follows that because work is done fast it is done well. It may be done well. There are men who combine excellence of production with rapidity in working.

What I am contending for is that this stop-watch test is mere speed and nothing else. The only thing that it is attempted to show in this way is how fast a man can do a given piece of work. It does not make any matter what the result is, but how fast can he do it, so that it will pass muster at the end. Of course, if he spoils it, that is another thing, but how fast can he turn out a given thing, some part of the lock of a gun or some part of a cartridge or something of that sort. How rapidly can he turn it out, how rapidly can he move the heavy pieces of iron that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] pointed out? It is quite possible to arrive at a standard of efficiency without putting on a stop watch. A great deal of efficiency, a great deal of standardizing is done without that. There is plenty of work which is done with the highest efficiency where no stop watch is used.

Now, in a military force, in an army or navy, or a semimilitary force like the police, it is absolutely essential that the unit should be sacrificed if necessary to the organization. To attempt to turn an army or a navy into an educational or a manufacturing establishment is to lose sight of the only purpose for which it exists, the military purpose, and is to destroy it as a military arm. But when you come to the organization of manufacturing, I think we should hesitate long before we undertake to sacrifice the unit to the organization.

Great results have been obtained in the efficiency of manufacturing without stop watches and time measures. Certainly most great and successful manufacturing establishments succeed in getting a perfect standard of efficiency without resorting to the stop watch, without working one exceptional man to the top of his bent and then establishing that as a standard other men must live up to. Efficiency is determined not by one short heat. Efficiency is determined over a period of time and many things enter into it besides speed.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I do not believe in that part of the system which involves putting a time measure on the men in our Government shops.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to ask the Senator, prompted by a remark he has just made, this question: Is it a fact that under this so-called Taylor system, or the equivalent of it, the work of the most efficient is made the standard?

Mr. LODGE. I dare say they average it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wondered about that, because it would seem to me to be wrong to take the most efficient man, the marvel, and make him the standard.

Mr. LODGE. No; I suppose they average it. I do not know on what system it is done, but they average the time that ought to be used. Then they pay the most efficient man the bonus. But I believe the efficiency can be reached in other and better ways. I do not believe that it is good policy for the Government in the Government shops connected with the naval and military establishments to harass men with this thing.

Now, I have heard it said here that in Watertown there was much of this that was abandoned. I do not know how that is. The Senator from New Jersey said that they have a very complex system at Watertown.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; they have a system that nobody is complaining about, a system which enables an intelligent superintendent to know just the degree of efficiency attained by every man, woman, or child in the plant. That is, of course, in effect now. They have a system of grading and give values and figures for sobriety and integrity and lack of tardiness. In various ways they are in position to rate them, and do rate them, in accordance with their efficiency. There is nothing to prevent them from putting this work now on a piecework basis. The point that I make is that piecework is not an ideal basis, and in private industrial establishments the tendency of piecework is to lower wages and increase production. I do not think it is a good thing. I do not think anyone thinks it is a good thing.

But that is not the tendency. At the Government plants they are more generous and more humane, as a general proposition, than they are in private plants, and the evils which apply to a piecework system in a private plant are not present in a Government plant. Everything that the proponents of this proposition are contending for—I mean now my opponents—can be obtained by this piecework system.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I was contending.

Mr. HUGHES. That is the way I understood the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The efficiency is secured in other ways. I asked the Senator the question about the Watertown Arsenal because these men, representing every branch of the work, some of whom I have known for many years, who are eminently good citizens and reputable men, occupying positions of trust there, have all united in protesting specifically against the "time study," as they call it. I do not believe that these men desire to cheat the Government or to give the Government other than a thorough and fair eight hours' work a day. They are anxious to keep their places, and certainly would not seek to injure the Government. I suppose it may seem very strange, but I think the opinion of these men is just as much entitled to consideration as is that of employers generally, who want the Government to maintain this system.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Massachusetts is undoubtedly familiar with the fact that Gen. Crozier and other officers who are in charge of various plants have been insisting for years that they are manufacturing at a cost that compares favorably with the prices charged by outside establishments. It has for years been their boast that they have brought their plants to such a state of efficiency and have such a high class of labor that they can furnish a great many articles which the Government uses sometimes at a cost away below the cost at which they are furnished by private plants, sometimes for one-third of what private plants and corporations charge the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I know that has been asserted and that the Taylor system is a comparatively recent introduction. Those arsenals—there are two in my State—had been brought to high efficiency before the Taylor system was ever introduced.

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. And it is the same, I think, in the naval workshops.

Mr. President, I do not believe in the stop-watch time study, wholly apart from the question of what one side or the other wants. I think it is that confusion which runs through all our modern production—stimulated thereto by the great inventions—that confusion between speed and quality, that quantity rapidly turned out can make up for quality. It never can. I do not mean to say that there are not cases where speed and quality have been combined, but I do say that a mere test of speed does not test quality. I think that to assume to say that we are going to improve upon any manufacture by merely finding out how fast a man can move a piece of iron or turn out a portion of a gunlock is an absurdity on its face.

This worship of speed—mere speed—in manufacturing and in every other function of life is repellant to me. In addition to that, I do not believe in applying this to workmen. I do not believe that the manufacturing force is a military force; I do not believe the unit should be overlooked in the organization. I do not know that any inhumanity has arisen out of it, but I do believe that efficiency can be secured and the men who deserve the higher ratings can get them under more humane methods than are proposed in this system.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I do not believe that the God of humanity breathed the breath of life into man that he should live to work, but that he should work that he might live—a very wide difference. I feel, and I think we shall all agree, that the problem of our civilization to-day is to lighten the burdens of mankind. I feel that the Taylor system, so called, would tend to make a mere machine of man. I believe it is absolutely uncalled for and utterly out of line with our thoughts of progress and the advancement of this age, and utterly un-American. My experience is, as an employer of men—and I have employed many of them—that workmen are not all loafers nor "snides," as some are called, but that the great majority of them are honest, well-meaning citizens and a benefit to the human race.

I believe this proposition is utterly un-American and unjust. I believe it is cruel and inhumane. A stop watch, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said, is used in a horse race. Yes, it is; and I first knew of a stop watch in that way. I have never owned one, however, and never want one. But a stop watch is used in another way. They use a stop watch at a prize fight, and they are very important, so I am told, for men who engage in a pugilistic encounter.

I believe in treating workmen as though they were human beings, and not as though they were mere machines. The whole effort in this proposition is to run men to the degree of a machine. I have received, and doubtless other Senators have as well, hundreds of letters from workmen the country over, protesting against the stop-watch system, the holding of a stop watch over a man, as, in one instance, Mr. Taylor has said, so that when a workman is shoveling you shall gauge by a stop watch just how long it takes to shove his blade of the shovel into the earth or into the sand or other material, and then just how many seconds transpire between the time of the filling of that shovel and the tossing of it over to the receptacle or other place it is designed to go. I do not believe that God, in His edict that we should earn our bread by the sweat of our face, ever designed or devised that mankind should be narrowed down to that miserable sort of mechanism. I do not believe that in this day and in this age this system is necessary; and it is not necessary, certainly, in this great country, which has been blessed beyond parallel with wealth, with climatic conditions, and with other things that should tend to make better the human race.

I have received many letters on this subject. I have to-day received letters from Newark, of workmen and machinists, dated February 17. I have another dated the 21st. All these men protest, and thousands of others have protested, against this unfair, ungenerous, and un-American system.

Whatever private men may do to eke out more wealth from the toil, the blood, the sweat, and the energy of their workmen in private establishments we may not be able to control; but do not let it, I say, ever be said that the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States has adopted a system whereby an employer or a foreman or a boss may stand over workmen holding a time watch to see the amount of time that shall be expended in order that each one of these workmen may make a standard for wages and for higher efficiency. The need does not exist. Humanity, civilization, justice, and wisdom, I feel, also protest against the adoption of this horrid system.

Mr. ROOT and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have been greatly puzzled to know what I should do in dealing with this subject. I have no technical, no practical knowledge of it. I must depend on what others may say about it, and then be guided by what I regard as just principles that should control the action of the Government in dealing with its employees.

I am greatly in favor of any system that tends to increase the efficiency of the employee rightfully and justly, not only because in that way he is made more helpful to his employer but because it is an advantage to himself. He is enabled in that way to secure better wages and to find a higher place as an employee.

I do not like, in the first place, the manner in which this question is presented to the Senate. The Government should deal with a question of this kind directly. It should lay out a policy for itself in dealing with its employees. This provision is simply one providing that a specific appropriation shall not be applied to a certain purpose if the superintendents or officers in charge of the work are enforcing the so-called Taylor system. If the Government believes in adopting the Taylor system, let it be adopted. On the other hand, if the Government is opposed to it, it should provide in direct terms that it should not be applied to its own employees.

I have no sympathy whatever with any system that tends to reduce the most efficient employee to the level of the inefficient one; and that, I am afraid, is being very largely done under the rules and regulations of the labor organizations. I think it is a vicious system.

I have no sympathy, either, with the effort to control the work and the conduct of an employee by constant surveillance of him, or watching over him while he is doing his work. It is a species of slavery that ought not to be allowed in this country. The stop-watch system, as has been very well said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], tends mainly, if not entirely, to speed and not to real efficiency. Indeed, I think it has the contrary effect. The man who is induced to overwork and to look simply to the quantity of material that he may turn out, is more likely to do poor work than is the man who is allowed to take his own way and work as it is natural for him to work.

I would not see much objection to the other provision of the bill if it were a direct provision to allow the efficient man a premium for the work he does, provided the hours of labor are limited. So long as the hours of labor are limited to eight a day a man can hardly be overworked. A stimulant of that kind is not likely to do any great harm, but my mind revolts against the other idea of watching over him with a stop watch every step he takes, every piece of work he attempts to do.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the Senator from California, as is the case with a great many other Senators, does not seem to make any distinction between a premium system and a piecework system. I have said that I am perfectly agreeable that the work at Government yards and arsenals shall be placed on a piecework basis, and that will result, as the Senator desires, in rewarding the man who does the most work; but that is entirely different from the premium system, and it is to that system that I object. The trouble is that we are discussing things about which to a large extent we agree. If the Senator will get the distinction clear in his mind between a premium system and a piecework system, he and I would not have much difficulty, I think.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not very likely to do that, because in my judgment there is very little difference between the two. Where a man works at piecework, of course it is to his interest to turn out just as many pieces as he can, whether they are good, bad, or indifferent. It is precisely so with respect to the premium system, which allows him additional wages for the increased or added amount of work he may be able to turn out. In principle there is very little, if any, difference between the two.

Mr. HUGHES. The difference is that, to start off with, it would be possible under the premium system to make the minimum for the day's work. For instance, as I cited a while ago, 190 minutes was arbitrarily given for a certain task. The number of minutes to be consumed in performing that task was reduced to 170, and then it was said that for every minute saved out of the 170 a half minute's wages would be paid. Surely the Senator can see a distinction between that and a straight piece price. I will assure him, at any rate, that there is a vast difference, and that it is the whole question involved in this controversy.

Mr. WORKS. Well, Mr. President, I can see a very great difference between the piece-work system and the premium system where the amount of work that the laborer is allowed to do is limited. In that case there is a very great difference.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator misunderstood me. I said the number of minutes which were allowed for the completion of a certain task were limited. In the case I cited from Mr. Taylor's pamphlet 190 minutes had been allowed for the completion of a certain task. This time was reduced, as I recall the figures, to 170 minutes. Then the employee was told: "Hitherto you have been working 190 minutes to complete this task, now you can complete it in 170 minutes, but if you complete it in 169 minutes you will receive one-half minute's more pay." He takes an illustration from the Bethlehem Steel Co., where he finally left a gang of workmen doing 300 per cent more work than they had been doing when he took charge of them. That was a class of work into which the consideration of quality did not enter at all; it was merely transporting pigs of iron from one part of the plant to another. Under the premium system he had forced those men up to a production which he himself admitted the ordinary man could not have done, and a day's work in that particular line of industry becomes so onerous and so burdensome that only the very flower of the physical manhood of the plant could hope to engage in it. What became of the others? We can not base our industrial system on the capacity of men in the very flower of their physical manhood and strength; we must take into consideration the frailties and imperfections of the human organism. Youth and age are to be taken into consideration as well as the prime of life.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he knows of any employee in these establishments whose wages have been reduced?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know of any employee whose wages have been reduced; but I do not know of anything in my remarks that would call forth that inquiry.

Mr. ROOT. That was the inference that I drew from the Senator's objection to taking the very flower of the whole body of employees as the standard, as I understand it.

Mr. HUGHES. Probably the Senator and I misunderstand each other. I was citing an instance which was given by Mr. Taylor with reference to the Bethlehem Steel Co., a private corporation. The Senator misunderstood me. I probably did not make myself clear.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the piece system may be made objectionable either by requiring that a certain piece of work shall be done within a limited time—which is one side of it—or by requiring that only a certain amount of work shall be done within 24 hours, which is another side of it. The one tends to crowd out the inefficient man and to prevent him from working at all, while the other tends to reduce the efficient man, who can do a greater amount of work during the day, to the level of the inefficient man. They are both objectionable—one about as much so as the other—but I was talking about a straight piece system that contains no such limitations or restrictions.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I shall try not to take up an undue amount of time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] on official business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the particular matter regarding which I desire to say a few words is the provision included in the Army appropriation bill as it came from the House, which I will take the liberty of reading, as it is very brief. After provisions for the Field Artillery and for ammunition and other ordnance supplies occur these words:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or other time measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and no claim for services performed by any person while violating this proviso shall be allowed.

That provision has been stricken out by the Senate committee, and the question before the Senate is, Shall we sustain our committee in striking out the provision, or shall we reverse the committee by leaving the provision in the bill?

I will say at this point that the provision which our committee has stricken out was not put into the bill by or upon the report of any committee of the House, but was put in on the floor; so that both committees of both Houses who have had the opportunity to study and maturely consider the subject were against the provision now under consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ROOT. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has been reported favorably by other committees, both of the Senate and of the House.

Mr. ROOT. That I do not know. All I know is what the committees have done about this bill. I shall presently refer to other things that have been done upon this subject, which, to my view, would constitute a far more satisfactory way of dealing with it than this provision, which undertakes to withhold pay from any officer who undertakes to pay any premium or to use any time-measuring device to fix a basis for paying premiums.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. Would the Senator care to call attention also to the fact that it was put in at a time when the bill was being passed under such conditions as forbade any extended debate on the provision?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have not personally inquired into that subject. I have been so informed.

The practice at which this provision is aimed is but an example of an attempt to apply, in the manufacturing establishments of the Government, a theory or method of dealing with Government work which appeals to me as being wise and just; that is, the practice of endeavoring to pay wages in such a way that the best, most industrious, alert, and effective workman will be paid more than the dull, slow, indifferent, and ineffective workman. The question whether or not that is a wise thing to do lies at the bottom of this whole discussion. The answer to that question, to my mind, necessarily leads to an answer to the question raised by the action of the committee in striking out this provision. I have no doubt about it, sir. I have no doubt that it is highly desirable that men in the Government employment and men everywhere shall have prizes given to them for those qualities which make for efficiency, for growth, development, and enlargement of power. I believe that to be one of the essential and vital qualities of American development—that our system, industrial and social, affords opportunity for ambition, for industry, for alertness, for courage, for hope.

I sympathize from the bottom of my heart with the men who, in labor unions, are endeavoring to better their conditions. I think they are proceeding in accordance with the true methods of a free Republic, and I sympathize with them a hundred times over rather than with the men who come running to the Government to help them. They are helping themselves. But, sir, there is one tendency of organized labor which has always seemed to me to be most unfortunate and injurious, and that is the tendency to prohibit any man from rising in his effort and his efficiency above the standard of the lowest; the effort to level down to the lowest grade instead of the effort to lift up to the highest grade; the effort to prevent men who work with their hands from having any incentive to their ambition; the effort to put a dull level before all the young men of America who are to work with their hands, and forbid them to rise above it. It is contrary to the whole spirit and genius of American life; and the whole opposition to this system, unless it be criticism of details, is based upon that theory, that the best shall be like the worst, that ambition shall have no hope. I do not believe in it.

Sir, what is called the efficiency system is one method of attempting to apply to Government employees in the manufacturing establishments of the Ordnance Department the plan of grading wages according to efficiency. There are several different ways of doing that. The first and simplest is piecework. I have great interest in this subject, because 12 or 15 years ago I was engaged, as head of the War Department, with the Chief of Ordnance who is reporting to us now on this subject in extended discussions with the men of the Rock Island Arsenal about the simple method of applying the plan I have spoken of to that arsenal through the method of piecework. The labor organizations were very strongly opposed to that, and it gave us great trouble and great solicitude; but it was finally disposed of upon the general proposition that the people of the United States were the greatest labor organization in the world, and that we represented that organization. Accordingly in the Rock Island Arsenal so far as piecework was practicable it was continued, and the men who did the most got the most, and the men who did the least got the least; and now I learn from the Senator from New Jersey that piecework, 12 or 15 years after that controversy was ended, is not objectionable.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether, in dealing with that matter, there was any limitation upon the amount of work that an employee might do, or any time limit within which he must do it?

Mr. ROOT. There was no time limit. That is, the hours of labor were fixed.

Mr. WORKS. Oh, yes; I am not speaking about the hours of labor, but the quantity of work—that if a man did a certain quantity of work he must stop work within the eight hours?

Mr. ROOT. No; there was no requirement that he should stop work, as I remember. I would not be very certain about my memory as to details, for it is a long time ago.

That is one way of applying the principle of paying the most money for the most work; but, sir, there are many kinds of manufacture to which it is impracticable to apply the piecework method, because each one of many men is engaged, not in making a piece, not in making a thing you can count, but in doing certain things which contribute, together with the things done by many others, to a product. The so-called efficiency system is but a method of undertaking to apply the method of piecework to that kind of production. The way of doing it is to ascertain by observation what number of operations contributing to a product which includes operations by others, and which therefore can not be called a piece to be paid for by the simple piecework system, will be normally performed by this contributor to the product, what number by that contributor, what number by a third contributor, and what number by a fourth contributor, getting the normal number of operations, and then taking that normal number as the standard, and giving extra compensation to a man who does more than that.

In the course of the ascertainment of the standard there has to be a time measurement. It is no more a time measurement, however, than the application of the eight-hour day is a time measurement.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ROOT. One moment. A stop watch, or a measure of time within the terms of this provision—that is, a time-measuring device—is used to tell when men begin work in the morning and when they end it in the afternoon, and it is necessary for the application of the law which prohibits their being at work over a specified number of hours. The measurement of time is essential, as I understand, to the fixing of the standard; and when the standard is fixed that ends it.

I now yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator is falling into the same error that several Senators on his side of this proposition have fallen into, and is confusing the piecework system with the premium system. They are just as different in practical effect, however alike they may appear to be in theory, as two things can possibly be.

There is no practical difficulty, although the Senator thinks there is, in applying the piecework plan to various incomplete operations; and I should like to lay down the broad general proposition that the piecework system is infinitely easier to put into effect at any part of a manufacturing plant, at any stage of the production of a product, than is the Taylor efficiency system. The difference between the piecework system, if the Senator will permit me, and this efficiency system or premium system is that under a piecework system the worker gets all the profit of his additional work. The premium system is devised to give him only a part of it, to rob him of a part of it, as in the case of the illustration that I cited only a little while ago, where 190 minutes had been the standard time for the production of an article. It was reduced arbitrarily under this system to 170 minutes, and then they said to the workman, "For every additional minute that you save under 170 we will give you half pay," so they divided the profits of the time saved between the plant and the man.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I accept what the Senator from New Jersey says; but let me point out that the difference to which he points is merely a difference in the way of applying the system, and that would be met by a provision, if you think it is a wise and a just provision, that all the advantage shall be included in the premium. As it is now, the advantage is divided between the workman and the Government. The Government, by the increased efficiency brought about by this system, gets its work done at a lower cost and the workman gets a higher pay for his work.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to be assured of the correctness of the statement of the Senator from New York that the stop-watch or other system of keeping time applies only to the time of going to work and the time of ceasing work. There would be very little, if any, objection to that; but, as I understand, the stop-watch supervision over the given employees goes much further than that. It measures in time each step of his work during the day, which I think is intolerable.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the stop watch is used only in the study for the purpose of establishing a standard, and that it does not continue with the workman after the standard is established. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to confirm in the strongest terms the statement of the Senator from New York. The idea seems to prevail in the minds of some Senators here that the purpose of the stop watch is to find that a man can do a piece of work in perhaps 70 minutes, and then for an overseer with a stop watch to stand over that man day by day and see that he never exceeds that time. That is not the purpose of it at all. The purpose is simply to study the time that can be reasonably and efficiently taken in performing certain operations, and then to fix the rate of pay on the basis of that time. When the study is over the stop watch is never used.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. It might relieve my mind on this subject if the Senator from Rhode Island would give us some idea as to the time for which this study is pursued. I presume there is no fixed time for all workmen; but certainly he might give us some idea with respect to it, as he is a manufacturer himself.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from New York is speaking now. When he finishes, I shall try to say a word or two on the subject.

Mr. WORKS. Very well. If the Senator will cover that subject later on, I shall not interrupt the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. My understanding is that it continues for a very short period, long enough to establish an average. The Chief of Ordnance refers to the subject in his report for 1912 in these words:

> The time study affords the most accurate measure yet devised for determining the just quantity of work that should be performed without overexertion and the premium system is one of the means by which this just quantity of work can be adequately paid for. The combination of the two secures increased earnings to the competent workman without a corresponding decrease to the less competent, a positive and material step forward which it would seem should meet with general approval.

You will perceive that the language of this provision is not aimed at the surveillance or supervision of the workman with a stop watch. It is:

> While making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee.

That is the sole object, the sole function. It is as a Senator said to me the other day: "I was mayor of the city in which I live at one time, and I undertook to find out what the street-cleaning people were doing and by observation to ascertain how many square yards of street the average man kept clear during the day, and then made that the standard to which the street cleaners were required to conform."

I do not see, sir, how there can be any basis obtained upon which you are to differentiate the compensation of the effective and the industrious as compared with the ineffective and the indifferent unless you are permitted to observe and record the facts for the purpose of fixing a standard, and when you have that standard fixed all you have to say is that any workman who goes beyond it shall receive a premium. That is all there is to this, as I understand it.

I was much impressed, sir, at the time when we were having this old controversy about piecework in the Rock Island Arsenal, by a sense of inability to get at what was just and right in regard to the clerks in the departments. The system under which our clerks are employed contemplates a gradual moving up from the low places and lower salaries to the higher grades, and at this very time there was great complaint of favoritism and unfairness in the promotions. I was giving great thought to it, but there was no way that I could see by which we could get away from reliance upon the heads of divisions. These clerks are all working in divisions, and the promotions, when there are vacancies in the upper grades, are determined by the heads of divisions. It was all so vague, however, it all permitted so great an element of personal liking or disliking, of the personal feelings of the head of the division, that I have always carried a feeling that there is injustice done, because there never was any definite and certain standard upon which the efficiency of the clerks in those divisions can be ascertained; and without fixing a definite standard you are delivered over to personal likes and dislikes, or else you have to abandon entirely attempts to compensate the most efficient and useful beyond the least efficient. So that from the beginning of the attempt upon the part of our Ordnance Department to get at a definite and certain standard upon which they could offer rewards for merit to their workmen I have looked at it with great interest and great hopefulness, and I have kept along with it from the beginning in sympathetic conversations with the Chief of Ordnance, wishing him Godspeed in a work which I think is not only for the benefit of our Government by the production of its manufactures at a moderate and reasonable cost, but for the benefit of the workmen in the Government manufactories by giving them incitement to ambition and hope. This, I am sure, is necessary for the improvement and development of men who work with their hands, just as it is for men who work with their brain.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Can the Senator tell me whether the Taylor system, so-called, is anywhere in vogue in the departments to-day?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not like the use of the term "Taylor system." The effort that I am describing was begun in our Ordnance Bureau long before Mr. Taylor was generally known. What is generally described, I think, as the efficiency system—that is, the system of endeavoring to get a normal average standard and paying a premium for going beyond that—is in use in varying degrees in practically all the manufacturing establishments of the Ordnance Bureau.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If that is true, what will be the effect of the adoption of the House provision?

Mr. ROOT. The effect of the adoption of the House provision will be twofold. In the first place, it will largely increase the cost of production by the Government, and it will result in giving to the Government a very much smaller quantity of ammunition and ordnance stores for the appropriation that we make. It will result in the good workmen, the best workmen, the ambitious and the energetic workmen, having the heart taken out of them and being reduced in their compensation to the level of the indifferent workmen.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Can the Senator state whether the workmen employed in these concerns are asking that this change be made?

Mr. ROOT. The only thing I know as to that is the papers produced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which show that in the Frankford Arsenal there are 400 who signed a paper asking for the continuance of the system, objecting to the House provision, and the fact that in addition to the signing of that paper they applied to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania to get them a hearing before our Senate committee in order to urge that this House provision should not remain in the bill.

In his report of 1911 the Chief of Ordnance says:

About three years ago the department began to devote attention to the subject of scientific management as applied to its manufacturing operations. Previously to the last fiscal year the subject has been considered more as an experimental detail of shop management, but it has now assumed sufficient importance to justify a reference to it in this report.

That is to say, we go back, then, to 1908, when the Ordnance Bureau took up this subject of endeavoring to differentiate payments and get a standard upon which to differentiate payments. The Chief of Ordnance continues in this report of 1911:

It is unnecessary here to attempt any detailed description of the principles of scientific management or the particular application of those principles which constitutes the "Taylor system," since both have been the subject of extensive discussion in the public prints and have been very fully described in various treatises. It may be said, however, that the principles are no new discovery, nor are they claimed to be such by the advocates, and that the many details have been the subject of special and laborious attention for many years. One of the basic ideas is the application of educated and scientifically trained intelligence to those operations of manufacture which were formerly considered either as of too small importance to attract such attention or as belonging entirely to the practice of a trade, and were therefore left to the judgment or choice of those immediately and practically connected with the operations; that is, the workmen and foremen.

He says also in this same report:

When the claims made by the advocates of scientific management first attracted my attention the question of the efficiency of existing shop methods was naturally raised in order to estimate the probable value of a change. It is believed that the shop methods in effect at the different arsenals were fully abreast of the best general practice in private industries of the same nature. While therefore the general conditions would compare favorably with commercial practice, in those arsenal shops engaged in the manufacture of small arms, ammunition, etc., where the work consists of turning out large quantities of the same pieces, the necessity for closely coordinating the successive operations and for eliminating delays had been more evident than in general machine-shop and jobbing work, more study had been given the subject, and as a result the methods there were highly developed. It may be said, in fact, that those shops have had scientific management for years and do not, therefore, appear to afford as wide a field for improvement as might be found in the others.

You see, Mr. President, the application of this method does not result merely in ascertaining how long a time it takes to do a particular thing or how many times a workman can do a particular thing during his day's work, but it ascertains how useless labor can be eliminated, how useless operations can be eliminated. For example, here is one thing which I recall as having been developed by the application of this principle: A skilled workman had been in the habit of going himself to the other end of the room to get something that he needed in his process, and going back; whenever he wanted the particular article he would go and get it and take it back. An observation of the proportion of his time taken up by doing that led to putting a helper on, an unskilled one, perfectly competent to fetch and carry, and the fetching and carrying enabled the skilled man to apply his time and effort to doing the thing that he alone could do. The result was an immediate decrease in cost and an immediate increase in the skilled laborer's compensation. It was very much as if a trained, skilled lawyer were to undertake to copy his own papers in the operation as it was before the observation, and very much as if the skilled lawyer had a typewriter to copy his papers for him as it was after the operation.

The Chief of Ordnance, in the same report of 1911, says:

I may also say that one of the earliest publications upon "scientific management" was a work entitled "The Cost of Manufactures and the Administration of Workshops," by Capt. Henry Metcalfe, an officer of the Ordnance Department, published in 1885.

Then he proceeds to say:

As a result of consideration given the subject, the probability that the general machine-shop and job-work practice might be materially improved by the methods of scientific management seemed great enough to warrant a practical trial.

That is eight years ago.

With this object I directed, something over two years ago, the trial at the Watertown Arsenal, Mass., of some of the elementary features of what is known as the Taylor system, with the intention of testing out these features thoroughly and determining their value before proceeding further.

The test of those features has continued and it has produced some very interesting results.

In the report of the Chief of Ordnance for 1912 he gives a schedule showing how the compensation of the workmen in the Watertown Arsenal had been affected. It appears that from August, 1911, to June, 1912, the pay of molders had included the percentages of premiums which I will now read; that is to say, the pay of the molders had been increased by premiums to the following extent:

August, 1911, 14 per cent; September, 25.8 per cent; October, 22.6 per cent; November, 25.1 per cent; December, 22.5 per cent; January, 1912, 27 per cent; February, 17.6 per cent; March, 26.9 per cent; April, 30.8 per cent; May, 32.1 per cent; June, 29.4 per cent.

The pay of machinists during the same period at the same place had been increased—July, 23.8 per cent, August, 19.2 per cent, and so on down to June, 1912, 30.7 per cent.

The Chief of Ordnance summarizes these figures as follows:

The net result of these figures may be more significantly summarized by the statement that 153 men received during the last fiscal year a total of $6,938.43 more than they would have been paid except for the time study and premium features.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask if the Senator knows whether that was without the increase of the hours of labor?

Mr. ROOT. According to my understanding—and I am sure I am right—it was without any increase of the hours of labor and it was without any decrease of the pay of a single employee in that arsenal. It was not extra work. It was work done within the limits of the hours fixed, with the same hours of labor and the same pay to those who did not get premiums, but it was only that these young Americans entitled to opportunity, as all of us are, had it given to them and they utilized it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How about those who did not get the extra pay? Did they have to work any harder?

Mr. ROOT. They had to work no harder. Nobody had to work any harder. No one had his pay reduced and no man was compelled to work any harder. It was only the compulsion of his own hope and ambition that he wanted to improve his position in life and to benefit his family and to educate his children and to buy a home.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether any of the men who did not earn the premium got any less pay on account of the premium being earned?

Mr. ROOT. They did not. No man got less pay. This is not merely a discriminating system, it is an efficiency system. The Chief of Ordnance very justly says:

These very substantial increases earned under the premium method, without complaint of undue or disagreeable exertion, can hardly be regarded by any unprejudiced person as other than a distinct improvement in the industrial position of the workmen concerned, who must have been enabled thereby to live better and to obtain for themselves and their families advantages not previously enjoyed. It is difficult to believe that these men and those dependent upon them really favor a legislative prohibition of the premium feature, which would deprive them of their new comforts and compel a return to their former scale of living. I do not believe it, but by evidence gathered on the spot, as well as by the above considerations, am convinced that a free expression of opinion by the employees of the Watertown Arsenal, if it were possible to receive it, would be strongly in favor of a continuance of the system.

The reduced cost of production—at the various ordnance establishments, due to the improved methods of manufacture and to the premium system, as previously outlined, will continue to be realized from year to year. These savings were made with practically no reduction of wages of employees; on the contrary, there were a large number of increases in day wages at all the arsenals, and the earnings of those on a piecework or premium basis were increased considerably.

Then he says:

Due to the existence of these savings for the current fiscal year the estimates for the next fiscal year have been reduced, thus giving the most practical expression to the results obtained. The savings amounted to over $240,000, which was used to increase the amount of work done and material manufactured under the various appropriations from which the savings were made. The estimates for the manufacture of small-arms ammunition during the next fiscal year have been reduced by $150,000 below the current appropriations, but for the reduced sum just as much ammunition will be procured as would be possible under the present appropriations at the prices of a year ago.

Mr. President, I could well understand if some of these employees were to come here and say, "The Chief of Ordnance is not dividing this advantage fairly"; if they were to come and say that he is utilizing this increased efficiency in such a way as to give the Government too great a share of the advantage and to give us too small a share of the advantage. I should say, if that complaint were made, we ought to investigate it thoroughly, and, if it were found to be well taken, we should require that a fair distribution of the advantage should be made. But no one is claiming that. No one is claiming that any injustice has been done or that any injury has been wrought or that any oppression has been practiced in any of these establishments; but they read from a pamphlet by a theorist who has been writing upon this subject and speculate what might happen if what he says were to be applied.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he has heard of any complaint being made of favoritism given to employees in the matter of paying these workmen.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have not heard of any such complaint, and it is quite certain that if there had been any it would have appeared in the course of this discussion; it would have been produced before these committees. The real difficulty I apprehend would be not that the application of this system has wrought any injury, not that it has resulted in any unfairness, not that it has not been beneficial both to the Government and to the workmen, but that it is a little more difficult for labor to deal with; that is to say, if there were abuses under it it would be a little more difficult for them to deal with those abuses than it is with a straight-out day's wage. The simplicity of a day wage certainly, where every workman receives so much, makes it easy for the workmen to deal with it. They can get together and pass resolutions that they ought to have 50 cents a day more, and they can resolve to strike if they do not get it, and everyone, they and the public, can all understand it perfectly well. This business is a little complicated and there is apprehension, and it was voiced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], that it may lead to unfairness, not that it has done so. But, sir, we ought not to abandon a method which so greatly increases our industrial efficiency, which is so beneficial both to the Government and to all the taxpayers of the country and to the workmen who are engaged in the work, which affords opportunity and incitement to industry and alertness and activity and ambition. We ought not to undertake to stigmatize or to penalize our officers for employing it, because it is possible that it may be more difficult some time in the future to prevent abuses. No one can deny that in all human affairs abuses are possible, but we certainly can deal with any abuses in these arsenals. If any employee in any arsenal comes to our committees and says, "We are being unfairly treated," or if any labor organizer or leader outside of the arsenal comes and says that the laborers in this arsenal are being unfairly treated, does anybody doubt that our committee will be ready to require that the abuses be remedied? There is no practical danger of it. The Senator from New Jersey himself but a short time ago told us that the employees in our Government establishments are treated with a larger generosity and greater fairness than in private establishments.

Mr. HUGHES. That is right, and I should like that to continue. I want to say to the Senator that it has been charged in the hearings before one of the committees, I can not recall which one now, I think before the House Committee on Military Affairs, that men were discharged, driven out of the service because they complained against the attempt to install this system. It was charged in the hearings that men who had complained against the installation or the attempted installation of the system, who had shown themselves antagonistic to it, had been separated from the service.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, if any man has been discharged from a Government factory for exercising his right of free speech, then the officer who discharged him should be held to account, and it ought to be proved. But you have no right to interfere with the wise and just and effective conduct of our Government operations by saying that there had been a charge made, and not proved, that somebody was prevented from objecting.

Mr. HUGHES. It seems to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. A far as I have been able to gather, everything the Senator desires can be obtained by the use of the piecework system in these cases. I did not hear everything the Senator said, but as far as I have been able to gather there is absolutely nothing in this language that came over from the House which will prevent the installation of the piece system; unless the Senator really wants the efficiency system installed in full, I do not know what objection there can be to this language.

Mr. ROOT. The objection to this language is that it destroys the old system that the Government officers are attempting to work out, and which, up to this time, has been worked out with such beneficial effects.

Now, let me go on to refer to the last report of the Chief of Ordnance in 1914. He says:

At the Watertown Arsenal the time study and premium features have been extended during the last fiscal year to branches of the establishment which had not previously enjoyed them and the amount of premium work in most of the individual branches has been increased. The following figures relate to the month of August, 1914:

He gives the number employed on premium work, the average premium over and above the regular pay expressed as a percentage of the latter. I beg the attention of the Senators present to this. These are the increases in pay brought about by this premium system to the kinds of workers during the month of August last:

	Number employed on premium work.	Average premium over and above the regular pay expressed as a percentage of the latter.	Percentage of all the work done which was performed under premium.
Molders	11	29.27	77.51
Machinists	167	28.18	51.30
Machinists' helpers	20	28.08	12.98
Laborers	20	22.03	9.62
Carpenters	8	20.50	18.59
Blacksmiths	5	20.59	13.93
Teamsters	5	26.87	98.59
Blacksmiths' helpers	6	19.29	12.40
Carpenters' helpers	1	31.43	.31
Screw makers	1	34.16	100.00
Chippers	1	42.01	27.79
Furnace helpers	1	23.11	2.09
Steam-hammer drivers	1	27.01	3.41
Skilled workmen	1	23.16	18.19
Masons' helpers	1	28.06	35.51
Molders' helpers	3	65.38	1.74
Painters	2	10.10	11.81
Skilled laborers	2	22.74	19.79

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the report anywhere give the proportion or percentage of men of each particular class who attain to a premium, who have had their wages increased; what proportion of the total employed in each class got more wages and what proportion remained as they were before? That may not appear in the report from which the Senator is reading; I do not know whether it does or not; but the Senator may come to it later on. I did not intend to disturb him.

Mr. ROOT. I have not examined the report to ascertain that fact. I do not see the statement here, although it doubtless may be found in the report, as to the number who did not work on this plan.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether or not there is anything in the report showing the total amount of money that was distributed during the year in the shape of premiums or bonuses?

Mr. ROOT. I read that from the preceding report. I do not see any such statement in this report. This report only undertakes to give the figures for the month of August, while the preceding report gave the figures for a long series of months and gave the totals. The Chief of Ordnance says:

It thus appears that during that month the 11 molders, for instance, worked, upon the whole, 77.51 per cent of their time upon premium work.

It would probably be impossible to separate them and say so many men worked on premium work and so many did not, for the premium method has been applied only to parts of the work. They are extending it gradually from time to time to other parts of the work, but I suppose the simpler cases have this application made first.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. In a moment, and then I will yield. Let me finish this sentence:

> And that during this time they earned, over and above their daily wages, a sum which amounted, as a whole, to 29.27 per cent of such wages. As their regular wages vary from $3.04 to $3.68 per day, they thus earned, during 77.51 per cent of their time, an extra amount per day varying from about $0.90 to $1.10.

Now I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to say to the Senator that if he will turn to the report of the Chief of Ordnance for 1912 he will find that that report sets out in detail the increases in the day rate and the increases in the monthly wage of the men of the different classes.

Mr. ROOT. I am obliged to the Senator from Oregon for that suggestion. With regard to the month of August, which the Chief of Ordnance produced in the report for 1914 to illustrate the working of the system, he says:

> Under this system there was paid to eight foremen, during the month of August, a sum averaging about 10 per cent of their regular wages. Including this last sum, the total amount which was paid out in premiums at the arsenal during the month of August was $2,657.29, and the total amount of time which was spent in work under the premium system was 26.25 per cent of all the working time at the arsenal during that month.

That is to say, that a little over one-quarter of all the time was employed on premium work. He deals with the charge that "this system involves the undesirable speeding up of men, stimulated by reward and punishment, to their resulting physical, mental, and moral detriment." He says further:

> When this charge was first made, at the beginning of the practice of the system in the Ordnance Department, it was speculative only and based upon estimates of the practice which were adduced from the reading of the writings of the advocates of the system, and it could be met only by arguments to the effect that these writings were misread and that the department had no intention of inflicting any of the evils apprehended on the workmen. The features objected to have now been in practice at the Watertown Arsenal for something over three years, and in examining the charge of disadvantage to the employees we are no longer required to deal with speculations and premises, but can appeal to a rather extensive experience, which only needs investigation for its interpretation. An investigation worthy of the name—

I ask especial attention to this—

> An investigation worthy of the name has been made by one body only, a special committee appointed by the House of Representatives about two years ago, while the practice of the system in this department was still quite new. This committee visited Watertown Arsenal and other establishments and took a great deal of testimony, which was printed in three rather large volumes. As a result of this extensive investigation the committee did not find, and did not say that it found, anything to the disadvantage of the employees in practice anywhere in the Ordnance Department. It stigmatized certain practices as undesirable, but did not state it found these practices in existence at any of the arsenals, and there is no difficulty in joining heartily in its statements in regard to them. It reported that the whole subject was at that time too new for definite conclusions in regard to it to be made, and it recommended that there should be no legislation by Congress upon the subject at that time.
> Some time after the submission of this report of the committee Congress, in August, 1912, created the Commission on Industrial Relations, of which the membership was appointed and confirmed about a year later. Following the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance the subject of the practice of scientific management at the arsenals of the Ordnance Department was taken up by the commission, which now has it under examination. It has taken considerable testimony, but has not yet personally investigated any of the arsenals.

He further says:

> Since the Commission on Industrial Relations has been especially created by Congress to give attention to such questions as this one; in view of its careful selection by the President and confirmation by the Senate, and of the expense which the country is incurring in maintaining it, it seems strongly to be desired that Congress shall not take action upon a subject to which the commission is devoting an important share of its attention, until after it shall have received the report and recommendation of this body which it has created as its agent.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be almost folly, without wishing to be disrespectful to any action of another House, it seems to me to be quite beyond reason that where our officers are engaged in what is certainly a praiseworthy effort to make their labors in behalf of the country effective, to secure efficient service in our great manufacturing establishments; where there is a prima facie case of benefit, so plain in its effects, as I have detailed; where a committee of Congress made an investigation two years ago and said that the experiment had not gone far enough to reach a conclusion; where we have appointed a commission to do this very thing, and they are engaged in investigating the actual working of the system, that we should go on and throw it out of the window, without evidence and without waiting for the report of this commission.

Mr. President, we can not expect faithful service from our officers, employees, and agents if we are going to treat them in that way. We can not have officers thinking, contriving, and laboring to produce good results in the great manufactures in which the Government is engaged if we are going to treat them in that way; we must encourage them; we must show appreciation of all efforts to improve Government processes; and we must not turn them down without evidence, or we will have inefficiency and indifference, opening the door to graft and corruption.

So, sir, I hope the Senate will stand by its committee and refuse this premature, prejudiced action contained in the provision which the committee has reported to strike out.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should not take the time of the Senate to discuss this question if I were not familiar with it and familiar with its history. The Watertown Arsenal, where the Taylor system was first installed, is located about 3 miles from my home. At the time the system was undertaken at the arsenal I was representing a district in the House of Representatives, and that arsenal was located in my district. Most of its employees were my constituents; therefore I am not only familiar with the arsenal but also familiar with what has taken place there during the last five or six years, during which the system has been used.

It seems to me, even after the very full discussion which has been indulged in here, that there is considerable misunderstanding in the minds of most Senators, as to just what the Taylor system means, though, if I may judge by the attendance here now, I do not think what I may say will have any particular influence upon that condition.

The stop-watch discussion has been worked overtime, in my judgment, and the subject has not been adequately understood by some of those who have discussed the question. That was the part of the system to which the men at the Watertown Arsenal objected when it was first installed; and undoubtedly the stop watch was used at that time, although not in the manner which many Senators seem to think. It was used to develop the different items in the completion of a process, to determine why it was that one man was able to complete the work on a piece of material more quickly than another.

It is a very simple thing for us to understand that if a man picks up a piece of material without turning and puts it in a lathe he will accomplish his work very much quicker than he will if he has to turn and pick it up and put it in a lathe. A stop watch was used on two men who were doing the same work; one of whom was taking 50 minutes to accomplish the work and the other 40 minutes. I am simply using this as an illustration. Then the officer attempted to find out why it was that it required one man 25 per cent longer time to accomplish the result than it did the other man. Very often he found that it was due to the place where the material was located, whether or not a man handled it twice before he put it in the lathe, and what he did when the material came out of the lathe—whether he placed it with one motion or whether he carried it some distance and took two or three movements in so doing.

It was a very simple thing to try to develop what these different items cost in time, not with the intention of speeding up the men at all, but with the intention of eliminating those movements which did not contribute to the value of the result. That has been the primary and the principal use of the stop watch in connection with this service; and it has not been used for the purpose of speeding men up to any considerable extent, if at all. The only connection between speeding up men and the stop-watch application is that it is used to try to determine what is a fair day's work or a fair hour's work for a man to do, and to use that as a standard.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] illustrated it by the time it requires to clean a piece of street. For instance, one man will do it in 50 per cent less time than another. Perhaps he is an unusually active man, and it would not be fair to make that the standard for all men; but by testing several men a fair basis can be arrived at, so that it might be determined in dividing up the streets in a city how much space should be allotted to each man as a fair day's work.

We have heard a great deal said about the efficiency of operation and management. I recall that last fall the Secretary of Commerce came to Massachusetts and said, among other things, that one reason why we had a tariff, in fact the only reason he could see, was because the manufacturers of New England were not manufacturing efficiently; that they were not using modern methods; that in some cases they were not using modern machinery; and that we were not able to compete with the principal nations of Europe because we did not have modern methods and modern machinery. The Taylor system and other systems similar to it are simply designed to enable us to compete successfully with other countries in the efficiency of management.

This question ought not to come up on an appropriation bill; in my opinion it has no place in an appropriation bill; but it is a question that should be considered on its merits, and the results which have been obtained from it should be used as a basis for our action, rather than statements which have not been carefully scrutinized and examined.

The system has been in operation at the Watertown Arsenal for five or six years. When it was first installed I had a great many complaints from the men employed there; and in one case the foundrymen, I think, struck, although they only remained out about one day; but at any rate there was a great deal of criticism on account of the methods used. As has been stated here to-day, committees have examined the results. The most thorough examination made was by a committee of the House of Representatives, which consisted of the present Secretary of Commerce, the present Secretary of Labor, and Representative Tilson, of Connecticut. They made this investigation after the system had been in operation for two or three years, and said at that time that there were not sufficient reasons for legislation which would take this system from the arsenal. They said, in effect, that it should have a longer time of probation, and that after it had been thoroughly tried a suitable conclusion could be reached.

While the Watertown Arsenal is not in the congressional district in which I live at this time, but is represented by the author of the provision which we are considering, yet as time has gone on I have had less and less complaint from the workmen at the Watertown Arsenal, and I find, on examination, that I have not had a single complaint from any workmen for the last year. It is possible that they are sending criticisms of the workings of the system elsewhere; but I think there is no reason why they would not send their criticisms to me, if they had any to make. I have had within the last three weeks letters from three or four workmen, with one or two of whom I am personally acquainted, who have expressed satisfaction at the workings of the system in such terms that I think it may be of value to read them into the RECORD. The first one is dated January 27:

BRIGHTON, MASS., January 27, 1915.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: No doubt you have received a number of letters regarding the bill to abolish the so-called premium system at the Watertown Arsenal. I wish to add a word to what has already been said. I have worked as a machinist seven years at the arsenal and know the conditions before and since the installation of the Taylor system, and there has never been a year when so great an amount of work has been produced as our commanding officer's report will show. The men have been able on the extra money earned to live in better homes and to dress and enjoy life better. I have heard of no one that has been injured by a "stop watch," nor from overwork. The few agitators (shop lawyers) that caused this bill to be sent to Congress are to be found in every shop and factory in the country. I earnestly request that when this bill comes before your honorable body, the United States Senate, that you will try and see this matter in the light that the thinking men of the Watertown Arsenal do.

Yours, respectfully,

JAMES A. MACKEAN,
154 Bigelow Street, Brighton, Mass.

It is noticeable that the writer says the "shop lawyers," who, I presume, he classes as agitators, are the ones who are disturbed about t' is condition. The thinking men who are working under its provisions are not disturbed, but are satisfied with it. Here is another letter:

Somerville, January 27—

Somerville is about 5 miles from the arsenal—

In view of the fact that the Army appropriation bill has passed Congress unopposed—

He means the House of Representatives probably—and unamended so as to seriously affect the conditions under which the employees of the Watertown Arsenal—of which I have the privilege of being one—work, I hope it is not too late to express my views in regard to the matter. There has been some opposition made by a few self-constituted labor leaders who take it on themselves to regulate matters to suit themselves, without any consideration or regard for the rights of others. The officers in charge of this arsenal are fair, upright men, and I am sure would welcome any suggestion that would in any way benefit us without making a national issue of it.

Hoping when your honorable body meets you will give it due consideration and get matters adjusted to agree with the large majority who are perfectly satisfied with conditions as they now exist.

Respectfully, yours,

JAMES MCFARLAND,
90 Prospect Street, Somerville, Mass.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it true, as I am informed, that at the Watertown Arsenal the system has already been abolished?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not so understand.

Mr. HUGHES. I call the attention of the Senator to this notice, published at the Watertown Arsenal under date of January 25, 1915:

Memorandum: In compliance with instructions from the Chief of Ordnance, all time studies will cease; also all premium payments except such as shall have accrued at the time of this notification.

C. B. WHEELER,
Colonel, Ordnance Department, Commanding.

Now, it seems that action was taken after all these magnificent results had been achieved.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, it would seem from the date which the Senator has given us that the action taken by the Chief of Ordnance must have been taken after or at about the time the Army appropriation bill was acted on by the House of Representatives, and he may have considered, in view of the action taken by that body, that it was best to suspend what the House evidently desired should be suspended until the Senate had acted. I did not know that that had been done.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say that he may have been influenced in his decision by two accidents which occurred, which were directly attributable to an attempt on the part of one of the men to work under a stop watch and of the other to follow a man who had worked under a stop watch.

Mr. WEEKS. I have read the testimony about those accidents, and I do not think the Chief of Ordnance was affected in his action by the testimony.

Here is another letter dated December 10, 1914, and reading as follows:

A copy of the inclosed is now in the hands of Mr. Chipman, the gentleman who, if I am correctly informed, is going to represent some of the employees of the Watertown Arsenal for the purpose of abolishing the premium system. As I have the honor of being one of your constituents, I earnestly request that you use your influence in opposing any legislation that would interfere with said system as applied at this place.

It seems that this gigantic move to abolish the system is backed by some outside selfish crew, the malicious intent of which my deluded friends are not aware of.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN DRISCOLL,
Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass.

John Driscoll is a resident, I think, of Brighton. Mr. Chipman is an organizer of efficiency methods, a resident of Cambridge, and writes that he is representing 221 of the machinists employed in the Watertown Arsenal. There are 666 men, or about that number, employed there. Not all of them are affected by the operation of this provision, so that Mr. Chipman undoubtedly represents a very large proportion of the men employed at the Watertown Arsenal who are affected by the provision. This is the letter that Mr. Driscoll writes to Mr. Chipman:

Mr. MINER CHIPMAN,
Brattle Building, Harvard Square, Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Recognizing your well merited and extensive influence in matters pertaining to scientific management, and if I am correctly informed, you are going to represent the employees of this arsenal in Washington in the near future for the purpose of abolishing the premium system. If by some unforeseen chance you should be successful in abolishing the premium system you will be instrumental in doing a gross injustice to the rank and file of the employees of this place.

While men in this and other places of this kind are always very willing to express their honest opinion in private, but owing to petty influences are not willing to go on record or be quoted, that is one reason why the men of this place will have to suffer in silence both financially and otherwise if you are successful.

Because a few men in this place tried the system once or twice and did not win is no reason why we should be denied the right to try because we did win.

There were 349 employees of this place who signed a petition to abolish the system. If the number who did not read that petition and consequently did not know what they were signing, together with the number who signed it just to be agreeable, were deducted from the 349, there would be nobody left but the framers. It is proven beyond a doubt that after three years' experience with the premium system the conditions here are far better than any place of the kind in this country.

As this is a very serious matter it is respectfully requested that you take a horizontal view of the conditions here as they exist before proceeding further.

Very truly, yours,

JACK DRISCOLL,
Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass.

Mr. Chipman wrote me on the 12th day of February a letter which, in effect, asked if he could obtain a hearing before the Military Committee of the Senate. It happened that the bill had been reported by the Military Committee, and therefore of course he could not obtain a hearing; but among other things he said this:

To explain my reason for asking this, I would say that I have been retained by 221 of the workmen at the Watertown Arsenal "to act as their counsel in the matter of their petition for the abolishment or change of the Taylor system of shop management as in operation at Watertown Arsenal."

Evidently he supposed that the Taylor system was in operation at that time, February 12.

An analysis of the written replies by three workmen to a sheet of some 30 questions reveals—

1. That the workmen lay upon the names "Taylor system," "stop-watch system," "premium system," or the ideas conveyed by these names, the blame for all the injustices they have suffered instead of placing the blame where it belongs, on the inefficiencies of the management in carrying out the details of the system in operation.

2. The workmen feel, as I do, that this is an economic question, and to attempt to solve it roughshod by legislation is the wrong way to go about it.

3. They are opposed to the amendment to the Army appropriation bill providing for the practical abolishment of time study and premium in Government shops during the life of this appropriation.

As I represent them and have their authority "to represent them before congressional committees or otherwise," I would like to be heard by the Senate committee having in charge the Army appropriation bill, in order to present to them the facts in my possession showing the attitude of the workmen and the reasons why this amendment, if allowed to pass, would have a detrimental effect on those affected, rather than the beneficial one which the exponents of the amendment presumably look for.

May I ask your kind offices to place this information in the hands of the chairman or some member of the committee?

As I said, the hearings had been concluded, and therefore nothing could be done for Mr. Chipman, who represents so many of the workmen.

I have had, in addition, a large number of letters from manufacturers in Massachusetts. They are much too numerous and too long to impose on the RECORD; and yet they are so unanimous in tone and give such substantial reasons for the retention of this system that it is a pity they can not be examined by all Senators before coming to a conclusion.

I have in my hand a letter from Mr. S. E. Thompson, a very well known consulting engineer, relating to the subject, and I want to read one or two extracts from his letter.

I note in the daily papers that Representative DEITRICK'S bill to prohibit time studies with stop watch has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Labor, and that Gen. Crozier has been criticized for favoring such methods. I fear that the insignificance of the measure will permit its passage, whereas if the actual effect of the bill were expressed, which is to prohibit all reductions in labor costs in Government work, the House and Senate would arise in a body to vote it down. The fact is, as I indicated in my former letter, the prohibition of time studies strikes at the very root of all progress toward reductions in costs of Government manufacture, improved methods of operation, and increase of wages to the workingman.

Manufacture has reached a stage where machinery has been so perfected that in many cases further increase in output is impossible except through the study of elementary details to eliminate unnecessary operations of the machines and the men. This can not be done without time study with the stop watch. It would be as reasonable to expect a builder to make an estimate of the price he would bid to build a house with no detail plans but simply photographs of somewhat similar houses of known cost as to expect to lay out work for men in an economical manner with no time studies.

I have never done any work for the Government, but am interested because the bill will prove a setback to labor in general and to manufacturing interests of a private nature as a result of the Government precedent.

My statements are not based simply on theory or hearsay, for I have personally proved the effect of time-study methods and have found invariably that the workmen were ready and even eager to adopt methods and rates of pay determined by time study. It is the outsiders who are not earning the extra money who invariably make the trouble wherever there is criticism. In one plant I am now advising we are reducing labor and manufacturing costs 25 per cent, while increasing pay of operatives even a larger amount than this.

My reasons for opposing the bill are:

1. It will prevent future reduction of cost in Government work.
2. It will prevent normal increase in the wages of Government operatives.
3. It will prevent the indirect benefits due to improving methods of management, because these can not be obtained without time study of men and machines.
4. It will prevent the Government from successfully competing with private contractors and thus curtail the amount of work that can be done by the Government.
5. Finally, it will take the matter out of the hands of the Industrial Commission, already engaged at large expense to the Government in taking testimony all over the country on this very matter, and will forestall their report.

I have here also a large number of instances that have been taken from the testimony given not only by Gen. Crozier but by other employers relating to the results obtained. In very many cases the cost of the article has been reduced as much as 40 per cent, while the wages paid to the workmen engaged in its construction have increased an equal amount. It is not at all unusual to find that a man who was obtaining $2.80 a day has been able to earn $4 a day, and in one case a workman who was receiving $3.12 a day was able to earn $5.06 a day under this system. I want to put just a few of these into the RECORD, simply to illustrate the point which I am now making.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM REPORT OF FORMER CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION OF THE TAYLOR AND OTHER MANAGEMENT SYSTEMS.

[Mr. Godfrey, pp. 1846–1847.]

FAVORABLE RESULTS OBTAINED FROM SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT AT TABOR CO.

The first plant under scientific management with which I was connected was the Tabor Co. I had full opportunity there to see all books and figures, and nothing was more impressive to me than the fact that the Tabor Co., with approximately the same number of men and machines as were used under the old system, was turning out three times the production; that it was giving 73 per cent higher wages to workmen; that it had made a 25 per cent reduction in the selling price of machines, thereby producing so much saving to the consumer. Moreover, that this company, which had lost money before the introduction of scientific management, were now and had been making a good profit; that from the condition of a strike and inharmonious relations before the introduction of scientific management there had come about the friendliest of feeling between management, workmen, and outsiders.

To take a single example, there was one line which referred to the drilling of a cylinder, that had to be drilled in a certain position and then set up and be drilled again. It cost $1.10 to set that up and drill it for the second operation. In the new design a drill was designed which could do that drilling with the first operation. The drill cost was, I think, approximately 10 cents, so that a dollar was saved on every single one of those lots going through, and those machines are absolutely in incessant demand.

APPLICATION OF SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT TO YARD LABOR AT BETHLEHEM STEEL CO.

At the end of some three and a half years we had the opportunity of proving whether or not scientific management did pay in its application to yard labor. When we went to the Bethlehem Steel Co. we found from 400 to 600 men at work in that yard, and when we got through 140 men were doing the work of the 400 to 600 men, and these men handled several million tons of material a year.

We were very fortunate to be able to get accurate statistics as to the cost of handling a ton of material in that yard under the old system and under the new. Under the old system the cost of handling a ton of materials had been running between 7 and 8 cents, and all you gentlemen familiar with railroad work know that this is a low figure for handling materials. Now, after paying for all the clerical work which was necessary under the new system for the time study and the teachers, for building and running the labor office and the implement room, for constructing a telephone system for moving men about the yard, for a great variety of duties not performed under the old system, after paying for all these things incident to the development of the science of shoveling and managing the men the new way, and including the wages of the workmen, the cost of handling a ton of material was brought down from between 7 and 8 cents to between 3 and 4 cents, and the actual saving during the last six months of the three and one-half years I was there was at the rate of $78,000 a year. That is what the company got out of it; while the men who were on the labor gang received an average of 60 per cent more wages than their brothers got or could get anywhere around that part of the country. And none of them were overworked, for it is no part of scientific management ever to overwork any man; certainly overworking these men could not have been done with the knowledge of anyone connected with scientific management, because one of the first requirements of scientific management is that no man shall ever be given a job which he can not do and thrive through a long term of years. It is no part of scientific management to drive anyone. At the end of three years we had men talk to and investigate all of these yard laborers, and we found that they were almost universally satisfied with their jobs.

APPLICATION OF S. M., AT RENAUD AUTOMOBILE WORKS, FRANCE.

The machine shops in this country have not taken the pains to use those slide rules as they should. They are not used to the extent that they ought to be. I may state, however, that I had a recent visit from the owner of the Renaud Automobile Works, the largest automobile works in France, together with M. de Ram, the young French engineer who personally became interested in the art of cutting metals some years ago, and in our system of management, and who put this system into one of Renaud's departments. These two men came over to this country especially to study our system (scientific management) and the art of cutting metals, and assured me that in those departments in which they had introduced the art of cutting metals and our system of management that they had much more than doubled their former output. They said that they were going back to France to spend any amount of money and any amount of effort to get it in as fast as possible in their entire works. The warning I gave them before they left was this: "You have been at it three years. Do not expect to get through with it for five years, because you will not. It will take you more than five years before you will get through the entire process of putting our system in."

I think you will find that people are more or less conservative; that follows just as much in a machine shop as anywhere else. When this thing was started in the machine shop nobody wanted to take it up. So we took in two of the younger men and explained to them what it was, and asked them to go on it. They went ahead, and they averaged 40 per cent more than the men around them. The third man who wanted to take it up was an old German named Joe ———, who had been with the company, I think, 15 years. He was over at Midvale 15 years before that. After he came in others came in in small groups. They would ask to be put on that kind of work. From that time on there was no opposition. The last men we put it on were the gear cutters. That work depends on the number of gears he is cutting. He worked a long while to get that established, and one man increased his rate 67 per cent. In the machine shop, if we do not put a piece rate on now we have a much harder kick, because a man, instead of working daywork, wants the chance to make that much more money. We pay the men an hourly rate equal to the highest hourly rate of wages paid in different machine shops around the city for that kind of work. The piece rate is 35 per cent above that.

The CHAIRMAN. What process, if any, is used to speed the workmen up in the handling time?

Mr. ADAMS. We do not speed them up; we make a time study of actions, all the movements can be divided into the small elements which make up the whole. We will take a time study on a man, and we give him a 35 per cent bonus while we are doing it, and we stand there with an open watch. We will say it is a very small operation, drilling a hole in a small pin. Put in the pin, pull down the head of the machine, and start the machine; we take the time on each one of these motions, and then we take the time for the whole. We then allow that time for the handling time of the job.

REDUCTION IN COST OF LABOR AND MATERIALS DURING DEVELOPMENT OF SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

During the development of the new scientific management at the Watertown Arsenal, the cost, not only of labor but also of material, in making sets of parts for the alteration of 12-inch mortar carriages (for short guns) was gradually reduced, "so that we have this result, that the direct labor cost per set was reduced from $480 to $275 per set. The shop expense cost was reduced from $335 to $332 per set, and the material cost was reduced from $785 to $362 per set."

COMPARISON OF OLD AND NEW SYSTEM OF DRAWING MATERIALS FROM STOREHOUSE.

The saving is due to the fact that our bills of material now call for just the amount of material required to go into a carriage, and our system insures that only that amount of material can be drawn from the storehouse. Under the old way there was no check to insure that no more material was drawn out of the storehouse than was specified, and we know that the bills of materials called generally for more material than was needed, and that frequently these requisitions were duplicated. So the net result was an overbuying of material for the Government.

DECREASE IN COST OF GEARS UNDER PREMIUM SYSTEM.

Referring to a case where a man was required to cut teeth in 17 steel gears: "As a result of the time study on this work, this man was told that the work ought to be done in 71 minutes, and that if it was done in 71 minutes he would get a premium of 33⅓ per cent. * * * Adding 66 per cent to that time made the time 120 minutes per gear within which he could earn a premium, his saving in time being shared by the arsenal. This man completed the 17 gears in 1,356 minutes, whereas his total allowance was 2,040 minutes, and he earned a premium of approximately 25 per cent. In executing this work under this system he reduced the cost of each gear from $2.41 to $1.06, or a saving per gear of $1.35."

[Gen. Crozier, p. 935.]

EMPLOYEES INCREASED EARNINGS AT PIECEWORK OVER DAY RATE, ARSENAL.

At the arsenal in June, 1911, one miller whose day rate was $2 averaged at piecework $3 a day; that is, his percentage of increase averaged 50 over and above his day rate.

Eighteen millers whose day rate was $1.75 each averaged at piecework $2.63 each; that is, their percentage of increase was 50.28.

Four millers whose day rate was $1.50 each averaged at piecework $2.02 each, their percentage of increase being 34.66.

Two millers whose day rate was $1.25 each averaged at piecework $2.23 each, their percentage of increase being 78.40.

In a group of 25 millers the increased earnings at piecework over their day work averaged from 34.66 to 78.40 per cent.

Fifteen millers whose day rate was $2.50 each averaged at piecework $3.09 each, their percentage of increase being 23.60.

Two profilers whose day rate was $2.75 each averaged at piecework $3.12 each, their percentage of increase being 13.45.

Twelve profilers whose day rate was $2.50 each averaged at piecework $3.09 each, their increase being 23.60 per cent.

Two profilers whose day rate was $2.25 each averaged at piecework $2.63 each, their percentage of increase being 16.88.

Another trade, polishers. One polisher whose day rate was $3.25 averaged at piecework $3.60, an increase of 10.76 per cent.

Eighteen polishers, whose day rate was $3 each, averaged at piecework $3.59 each, their increase being 19.66 per cent.

Eighteen polishers, whose day rate was $3, averaged at piecework $3.55, their increase being 18.33 per cent.

The object of that is simply to show, as stated at the time to the witness, that the rates are such that men, by the extra effort intended to accompany piecework, may make this percentage over and above their day rates.

[Gen. Crozier, p. 1172.]

RESULTS OF CONSIDERATION OF DIRECT LABOR AND SHOP EXPENSES.

If we considered only the saving we made in direct labor and in shop expenses, the total saving on the job would be about $13,000—a little over 10 per cent of the cost of the first order.

[Gen. Crozier, p. 1198.]

MACHINISTS UNDER NEW SYSTEM ARE REDUCING COST TO A NOTABLE EXTENT—EXAMPLES GIVEN.

With reference to the length of time that is required for making studies by the use of the stop watch, it is now reported from the Watertown Arsenal that the use of the stop watch in setting the time for the turret lathe work has practically ceased, and that the same condition is being approached in reference to the engine lathes—that very few time studies indeed have been made since the 1st of November in the foundry—although I think there are now working in the foundry, and have been for a month or two past, pretty nearly 75 per cent of the molders under the new system, and have given them compensation under that system. In the machine shop they have been working something like 20 per cent of the machinists under the new system. These men have been doing very well. They have reduced the cost of things. They have kept on reducing the cost of things to a notable extent.

I will give you a few examples, and these are very late examples. They have all occurred since the visit of the committee to the Watertown Arsenal. The cost of molding caster wheels for shop trucks, a wheel not very large, has been reduced from $1.45 to 93 cents, making a saving of 52 cents in this molding job, which is 35.8 per cent of what the cost has been, and the saving to the Government in making the things at this rate has been at the rate of $7.22 per day. As to the effect on the man's pay, that was increased from $3.28 a day to $4.44 a day, which is an increase of 35½ per cent. That is a bench job.

EXAMPLE OF FLOOR JOB IN FOUNDRY—REDUCTION OF OVER 41 PER CENT.

Now, I wish to give an example of a little different kind. Mr. O'Leary asked me about a bench job, so I gave him an example about a bench job. Now, here is an example of a floor job in the foundry, the molding of the elevating arms for a 6-inch disappearing gun carriage. The elevating arm is an affair shaped something like this [indicating]. It is intended to raise and lower the breech of the gun. It is pivoted at its lower end about an arbor and its upper end embraces the trunnions of a band which is placed on the gun near its breech, so that by raising and lowering this arm the breech of the gun is raised and lowered. It is about 6 or 7 feet long, and the spread is perhaps 20 inches up at the top.

That of course was a larger job than the one I mentioned a moment ago, and the cost of it under the day-work method was $42.35. After a time study had been made of it, the cost was reduced to $24.87, making a saving of $17.48, which was 41 and something over per cent of the original cost. The saving represented a sum of $9.94 a day to the Government. The man's pay was increased from $3.52 to $5.02, which was an increase of 42½ per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. I have here a statement by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, which appointed a competent committee to examine what was being accomplished there and the result which would naturally follow the legislation if it were adopted. The report is unanimous that the provision should not be agreed to.

Here is an important letter from the Aberthaw Construction Co., a concern which has grown in the last 12 or 15 years from substantially nothing to a size where it now employs 3,000 men. The writer says:

We wish to call your attention to the rider attached to the Army appropriation bill which has just passed the House. This rider is designed to prevent any efficiency work with stop-watch time study in Government arsenals. It seems to us that if the Government discountenances this sort of work it will be increasingly difficult for employers to apply it to their own operations. As we have found that this sort of work is very important in our work, and as others have found the same thing in theirs, it seems desirable that nothing should be done by the Government to hamper the growth of efficiency methods.

I shall not read any more of these communications which I have received within the last two or three weeks, but they are all alike in tone and conclusion with those from which I have quoted.

I have also three or four communications from labor organizations not connected with the Watertown Arsenal, but located in other parts of Massachusetts, adopting resolutions in favor of the bill. I think I have five all told. I notice this sentence in one of them, which is worth consideration, I think, by the Senate:

We shall carefully scan the vote on this measure, and hope to find few in favor of it. If not, our vote at the next election of Senators will be a reflex of the vote taken on this and other measures affecting labor.

I read that because labor and capital sometimes in their exuberance and enthusiasm suggest that the action of Senators and Representatives may be affected by their votes in the future. Of course, any such statement as that coming to a man who has any red blood in his veins, from any source, would incline him to vote against the proposition favored by those who advocated it in such terms.

In a word, I want to say, first, that in my judgment an appropriation bill is not the place for such legislation as this. In the second place, I want to say that the Industrial Commission, which has been taking a large amount of testimony on this and kindred subjects, should be given an opportunity to complete its investigation and make a report before any action is taken. While I think perhaps I have as much knowledge of this matter as anyone who has discussed the subject, because of the proximity of the Watertown Arsenal to my home, I have no knowledge on which I would want to base my vote as to whether or not the efficiency system is altogether desirable or whether it might not be modified in some respects so that it would meet the criticisms of those who criticize it and at the same time be beneficial to the Government and to the employees; but this kind of legislation is always a boomerang when it is adopted without sufficient investigation and sufficient facts. I am going to vote to sustain the committee report because I do not believe action should be taken until the Industrial Commission has reported, and because I want sufficient facts on which to form my own judgment before final action is taken. We all know how difficult it is to change any action which has been taken by a bill passed through Congress. It is a great deal better to do it right in the first place and feel sure that we have sufficient facts on which to base our action, and not to jump at a conclusion and then find we have made a mistake and try to correct our course.

Therefore I hope the report of the committee will be sustained in this case.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall take but a few minutes on this subject.

I notice that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] placed in the RECORD the action of the Boston Chamber of Commerce. I will ask the Senator, as I have been out of the Chamber necessarily a great deal to-day on committee work, whether he or any other Senator has put in the RECORD the action of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States taken recently in this city?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which held a meeting in this city very recently, consisting of 582 delegates, representing 293 commercial bodies located in 37 States, passed this resolution:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America in annual meeting assembled urges the Senate and the House to reject the so-called Deitrick amendment to the pending bill which makes appropriations for the Army in so far as this amendment seeks to prevent the study of methods to increase industrial efficiency in manufacturing establishments of the Government and forbids additional compensation to employees as reward for improvement in skill and effort.

So far as I know, that resolution was unanimously agreed to by that great organization, which is interested in subjects of this nature, and it ought to carry great weight.

I have received a very large number of letters on this subject. I am not going to burden the RECORD with them, and will content myself with reading from only two.

The first letter is from a large manufacturing establishment in my State employing skilled workmen, an establishment where they never have had any trouble with their workmen or strikes of any kind. The treasurer of that corporation writes me as follows:

My attention has been called to the Deitrick amendment to H. R. 20347, the Army appropriation bill.

I understand that Congressman DEITRICK is from the district in which is located the Watertown Arsenal, where a great deal has been done in the way of increased efficiency. The amendment is so utterly wrong, so hopelessly uneconomic, and so bad in its effect that it ought to be vigorously opposed. The bill with this amendment went through the House without any opposition, practically, on the general principle, I suppose, of passing all such things up to the Senate, and in the Senate a vigorous fight should be made to have this amendment, which should never have been tacked on to a bill of this kind, defeated.

Undoubtedly your good attention has been called to this vicious amendment, and I earnestly hope that you will do everything possible to see that this amendment does not become a part of the appropriation bill.

This amendment strikes at the foundation of efficiency, which is the great byword at the present time and toward which everybody is working. The Government is spending large sums of money toward efficiency in agriculture, efficiency in the Postal Service, and in many other directions, and it seems wicked that a backward step should be taken here. Timing the operations in a shop does not mean undue pressure being brought to bear upon the workman. It simply means that a proper study should be made of a workman's operations to see how his work can be made more efficient, how lost time can be eliminated, and how the production per man can be brought up without his injury. All concerns who are working on this efficiency plan recognize that undue pressure on the man would be to defeat the one purpose they are after.

A different line of reasoning, but equally logical, applies to the premium or bonus plan. It enables the workman who takes advantage of his movements, who does not waste his time, who is interested in his own advancement, to have this recognized in his earnings.

Nothing can be said in favor of this amendment. It is a sop of the worst kind to the laborer's worst enemies. * * *

While the question in this particular case involves only Government arsenals, navy yards, etc., if it passes there it is liable to spread out * * * into State legislation, so that this is the time to kill it. If hours are going to be shortened and if wages are going to be increased it is economically certain that it can only be done by using the labor of the man to his own and to his employer's best advantage.

I shall not give the name of the gentleman who wrote that letter, but shall content myself by saying that he represents a large corporation, with skilled and contented workmen, hundreds in number.

A portion of another letter is written by Mr. H. S. Person, who is the director and professor of organization and management in the Amos Tuck School of Dartmouth College. Mr. Person is also president of the Society to Promote the Science of Management. He writes:

On behalf of the Society to Promote the Science of Management, as its president and on my personal account as a citizen of New Hampshire, I beg to express the opinion that the Deitrick rider to the Army appropriation bill, designed to do away with time study and bonus and premium payments in Navy and Army work, is a pernicious measure, harmful to industry, and I ask you to vote against said amendment.

I make the following points to support my request:

1. The whole matter of scientific management is now undergoing a most thorough examination by the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, and Congress should pass no measure relating to scientific management until said commission has reported.

2. Scientific management in the Government arsenal at Watertown has proved to be a conspicuous example of improved methods, reduced costs, and increase of pay to workmen, without more strenuous labor on their part.

3. The opposition to scientific management at the Watertown Arsenal and elsewhere has not originated among the laborers at said arsenal * * *.

4. There is great need for greater efficiency on the part of Government institutions, and to destroy what has been accomplished at the Watertown Arsenal would be to destroy an admirable example of what may be accomplished for greater efficiency among Government institutions.

I sincerely hope you will oppose this with all the means in your power, * * *.

Mr. President, considering the small amount of time I have had at my command during the last few days, I have looked into this matter as carefully as I could. I am aware of the fact that in certain quarters it is deemed hazardous for any man in public life to oppose anything that labor organizations, or, for that matter, individual laboring men, ask of Congress; but I have never refrained from expressing my views on those subjects, and in a recent election I ran the gantlet of vicious opposition from labor organizations, their contention being based upon the ground that I was not a friend of the laboring man. I have heretofore refuted that statement, and I repeat it now—that if there is anybody on earth who is a better friend of the laboring man than I am I do not know who he is, but I shall never endeavor to prove that fact by advocating any measure that my judgment and conscience do not approve.

Mr. President, after looking into this matter with a good deal of care and listening to the debates to-day as far as I could, I am fully persuaded that the proper thing for us to do is to stand by the recommendation of the committee and agree to the amendment which the committee proposes. I might occupy much time in discussing this matter if I saw fit to do so, but there is no Member of this body more anxious than I to see the business of the Senate pushed along as rapidly as possible, and for that reason I shall not say another word except to renew the suggestion that I sincerely wish the amendment of the committee will be allowed to remain in the bill.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. The subject which is now before the Senate is one in which the people whom I in part represent would naturally take a very deep interest, as they are largely engaged in manufacture. I had proposed, therefore, to discuss it at some little length; but the hour is already growing late, and I know there are several persons who are impatient to have the business of the Senate go on at this time, and whatever I might have said upon it has already been said by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] in the remarks they have made. While I might perhaps put the same arguments in different language and might perhaps use a few other illustrations and read different correspondence in order to illustrate the points which they have made, I should in the end be simply advancing the same arguments that they have so thoroughly covered in the remarks they have made. Therefore I shall not undertake to do it, but shall merely say that in the opposition which I feel it is necessary for me to make to the abolishment of these bonus systems where they are employed in the Government factories I am not so much governed by the first provision which is contained in the amendment that is under consideration, which provides for doing away with the stop watch or other time-measuring devices, as I am with the second provision, which forbids any part of the appropriations made in this bill being available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages.

That seems to me to strike at the very basis of modern industrial efficiency. I can not imagine a more unfair and more unwise system than that which would forbid to industrious and experienced and expert employees an opportunity to receive wages in accordance with their skill and with their diligence.

In Rhode Island we have in recent years seen a succession of operatives come into our State from foreign countries and of different nationalities. Within my own lifetime the nationality of the employees in our textile industries has changed two or three times. In each case this meant the training of new people. In many cases it has meant instructing in the art of textile manufacture the people who come from districts in foreign countries where such business is entirely unknown. I have often thought that we were somewhat negligent in meeting the full responsibility of the situation which was put upon the managers of industries of that kind in that we did not have a practical school for the purpose of teaching these people who were coming fresh to those industries the scientific and proper way of running our machinery. I have many times seen anxious and eager people come into the factories and fumble in their attempts to learn to operate the machinery and become nervous and anxious and discouraged and disheartened simply because there was not some proper and efficient system for preparing them with the knowledge necessary for their guidance in beginning to operate those machines.

Much of the Taylor system which has been discussed here to-day is in itself an attempt to find a scientific way of improving the knowledge of the operative in running the machinery that may be given to his charge, and, as an incentive to acquire that greater knowledge, to give him some compensation in the form of advanced pay. It seems to me that to abolish that system would be a great injury to the operative, it would do no good to anybody concerned, and I can not see my way clear to support any provision which has that purpose for its object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I really had not intended to say anything at all on this matter which has been discussed so much at length, but as chairman of the committee I feel it my duty to speak very briefly upon some of the motives which animated the committee with reference to this amendment.

In the first place, there was a petition presented by the employees of the Frankford Arsenal, to the number of about 300, asking the committee to strike out the House amendment. I am going to ask that that petition, with the names of the individuals who signed it, may be printed in the RECORD, because I understand it has been said that the people at that arsenal possibly either did not sign it or were induced to sign it by methods that were not entirely fair. I want that petition printed, and the names of those who signed it printed with it, in order that we may know hereafter whether the people who pretended to sign it existed in fact or not. I ask that it be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Even if there had been no other consideration animating the committee, this petition would have been ordinarily sufficient to have induced them to strike out the House provision in reference to this subject. In addition to that, the committee had before it a letter addressed by the Secretary of War to the President of the Senate under date of January 30, 1915. In that letter, after setting out at length the amendment which had been put in the House bill, and after explaining the purpose and effect of the amendment, the Secretary of War proceeds to say:

> This question has been agitated for some time past, and when brought to my attention I requested the Commission on Industrial Relations to carefully investigate the whole subject matter with a view to reaching a proper conclusion thereon. This matter is one peculiarly within the scope of the jurisdiction of that commission. Just what they have done as yet in the matter I do not know, but I feel very strongly that the reasonable course to pursue would be to await their action and determination. If, for any reason, the Senate does not feel inclined to accept this suggestion, I most earnestly request that a hearing be accorded upon the subject matter, so that all the facts and reasons which should be known to the Senate may be developed before the Senate finally concludes the matter.
> With a view of acquainting the Senate somewhat more with the details of the situation I have caused the Chief of Ordnance to prepare a statement, which accompanies this.

That letter was signed by the Secretary of War, and attached to it is a memorandum for the Secretary of War from the Chief of Ordnance. The report of the Chief of Ordnance sets out at length the memoranda taken from former reports on the work of efficiency. I ask that that report be published also in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I understand that this investigation that has been mentioned as having been set on foot by the Industrial Commission has progressed somewhat, and there ought to be a report made in the very near future. It seemed to the committee and it seems to me that a question of such large import, a question of such great industrial and economic importance, ought not to be acted upon here in the Senate after a few days of investigation.

It makes no difference what may be the individual views of the members of the committee, and I am frank to say the committee was somewhat divided on the subject. It would hardly be proper for me to say what the views of any particular member of the committee was, except, speaking for myself, I may say that I am in perfect harmony with legislation which has for its purpose the uplift of the laboring people of this country, and I think the record I have made in the Senate will show that to be true. But I shall not agree to settle within the few days that we have to consider this bill a great economic question, where the lives and fortunes of so many people are involved, without knowing a good deal more about the subject than I know about this or than it was possible for me to know as a member of the great committee of which I have the honor to be chairman.

It has been stated, and stated truly, that this amendment was placed upon the bill on the floor of the House of Representatives without very much investigation. It was not reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate did not have an opportunity to investigate it, either.

So this reason, amongst others, influenced the committee in striking out the House provision.

There is another thing, too, Mr. President. I differ somewhat from my esteemed friend from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] in reference to the effect of this amendment. If it goes into this bill and becomes a part of the law of the land, it will have the effect to wipe out every system that is in vogue in all the arsenals and other public institutions and industrial establishments of the United States. These systems, generally speaking, are all different. Some of them are the result of the evolution of years of study. It may be that the War Department is trying to get all of them on a basis approaching the so-called Taylor system, but they are different nevertheless. If I had the time I could point out the differences in detail in those institutions. The piecework system governs in some, the bonus system prevails in others, and a near approach to the Taylor system is in vogue in others. This bill would practically change the whole industrial and economic system that governs in these different public enterprises. Hasty action ought not to be had.

If there is any injustice in any of these department, that is a matter which can very easily be investigated upon complaint of the humblest employee. The Government has the power at any time to investigate every complaint; but, so far as the committee was concerned, there was not a single employee of any of these institutions before the Senate committee objecting to the striking out of this provision. As a matter of fact, they all petitioned for it. Some claim has been made with reference to the Watertown Arsenal, it is true, that in years gone by there was objection to the installation of the Taylor system.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator referred a moment ago to an expected report from the Industrial Commission. Has the Senator any information as to when that report may be expected?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no information on that subject. The Secretary of War in his letter has referred to it and informed us that progress is being made. I know the War Department is anxious to get at the truth of this matter, and if possible to evolve a system which will equalize any differences there may be. But there was some complaint of the Watertown Arsenal at one time. The complaints were not numerous and not general. They were fully investigated and reported upon. I find from the letters which have been presented here by the Senator from Massachusetts to-day that the employees of the Watertown Arsenal individually seem to be in favor of striking out this provision.

These are some of the reasons which governed the committee. It was not an expression of views by the members of the committee as to how they stood on this so-called labor legislation. It was a question with the committee largely as to their duty in acting upon this very great question hastily and without being sufficiently advised upon the subject.

I felt it my duty to say this much, and I call particular attention to these matters, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks.

APPENDIX 1.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 1, 1915.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I transmit herewith a petition of persons employed by this department at the Frankford Arsenal, in which they protest against the suspension of premium payments. Attention is invited to the indorsement thereon of the Chief of Ordnance, showing that premium payments have been suspended because of a proviso in the Army appropriation bill now pending before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, which, if enacted into law, will prohibit such payments.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

(One inclosure.)

PETITION.

FRANKFORD ARSENAL,
Philadelphia, Pa., January 28, 1915.

CHIEF OF ORDNANCE, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned employees of the Frankford Arsenal, do respectfully enter our protest against the instructions received from you yesterday suspending all premium payments at this arsenal. We have been informed that your action is based upon legislation contained in the Army bill recently passed by the lower branch of Congress, and that therefore your action is out of respect for the views expressed by that body. Our reasons for protesting are as follows:

1. The premium system of payment was established in the manufacture of small-arms ammunition about five years ago, and that there was a complete understanding between ourselves and the management of the arsenal that there would be no reduction of the premium rates while the manufacturing processes remain the same. This agreement has been lived up to by the management and by ourselves and to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned.

2. We believe that this system has been eminently successful, because, according to published reports, the manufacture of small-arms ammunition at Frankford Arsenal presents a decided economy when compared with costs of the same ammunition procured from private manufacturers.

3. The premium earned by all the employees engaged in the manufacture of small-arms ammunition during the month of December, 1914, has amounted to $3,747.72, or to approximately $45,000 for the year, and therefore the abolishing of the premium system means an annual loss to us of approximately $45,000.

4. Many of us, based upon the premium system of compensation, have obligated ourselves to purchase homes, and if the premium rate is abolished it means the loss of our homes to us.

5. It is very probable that the branch of Congress which passed this legislation has in view the interests of the employees, but we beg to differ on this very point. While the legislation prohibits rewarding us for our increased efforts which we give to the Government, it does not prohibit an officer or foreman from requiring us to work just as hard as we are now working and for very much less compensation. The power of your authority and that of your officers and your foremen to make us work harder has not been lessened by this legislation, but you have been deprived of the opportunity of paying us for such increased work as you may give us to do.

We therefore ask you to submit this petition to the Secretary of War, with the recommendation that he transmit it to Congress for its consideration, and, we hope, favorable action.

Respectfully submitted.

THE FRANKFORD ARSENAL ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., January 28, 1915.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The committee whose names appear below, representing 400 employees of the Frankford Arsenal, do earnestly petition you and your fellow colleagues of the Committee on Military Affairs to report unfavorably the legislation passed by the House prohibiting the payment of premium rates to employees of the Frankford Arsenal. The premium system of compensation was introduced at this arsenal over five years ago, to the mutual satisfaction of the Government and ourselves. We made an agreement with the management of the arsenal with respect to the premium rates established, and with the understanding that while the manufacturing processes remain the same there would never be a reduction in the rates so established.

Our earnings under the premium system have averaged $3,747.72 per month, or $44,972 annually, and many of us, based upon the increased compensation, have obligated ourselves to buy homes, and the loss of the premium system means the loss of many of our homes. We do not doubt the good intentions of those who proposed the legislation, but we feel, nevertheless, that a great injustice has been done us. You will see that under the proposed legislation, while we lose our increased compensation, there is nothing to prevent the Government from making us work as hard or even harder than ever, and without any reward therefor.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH B. MOSS,
HARRY F. WARD,
JOHN SHIELDS,
Committee.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, January 30, 1915.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR:

1. The legislation referred to in this petition is contained in a proviso of the Army bill (H. R. 20347), which passed the House of Representatives on January 22 and is now pending in the Senate. The language referring to the class of payments which have been suspended at the Frankford Arsenal is the following:

"* * * Nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and no claim for services performed by any person while violating this proviso shall be allowed."

2. As the legislation is claimed by its proponents in the House of Representatives to be in the interest of the workmen who would be affected by it, I have considered it but just to all such workmen that they should have warning as to the effect of the measure in case it should be enacted into law. I have therefore given the same effect to the prohibition that it would have if it became law by directing that all premium payments, except such as have already accrued, shall cease at the arsenal.

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

[Senate Document No. 800, 63d Cong., 3d sess.]

TIME STUDY AND PREMIUM PAYMENTS.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF WAR RELATIVE TO A PROVISION IN THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL AGAINST TIME STUDY AND PREMIUM PAYMENTS AT GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHMENTS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 30, 1915.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: In the Army appropriation bill, H. R. 20347, which passed the House of Representatives on the 22d instant, there occurs the following legislation, added as an amendment upon the floor of the House:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and no claim for services performed by any person while violating this proviso shall be allowed."

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to prevent scientific management in the branch of the business of the Government which is affected by it. Surely this is a subject matter of great importance and should be dealt with directly and only decided after careful investigation and deliberation. It was not relevant to any matter contained in the Army bill, was not brought up in the hearings before the committee in the House so that both sides might receive full opportunity to present facts and reasons, and did not and could not receive full consideration under the circumstances, and when the amendment as adopted was presented to the bill on the floor of the House. Under the circumstances I feel that it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the situation so that they shall not vote thereon in ignorance of the importance of the subject matter.

This question has been agitated for some time past, and when brought to my attention I requested the Commission on Industrial Relations to carefully investigate this whole subject matter wih a view to reaching a proper conclusion thereon. This matter is one peculiarly within the scope of the jurisdiction of that commission. Just what they have done as yet in the matter I do not know, but I feel very strongly that the reasonable course to pursue would be to await their action and determination. If for any reason the Senate does not feel inclined to accept this suggestion I most earnestly request that a hearing be accorded upon this subject matter, so that all the facts and reasons which should be known to the Senate may be developed before the Senate finally concludes the matter.

With a view of acquainting the Senate somewhat more with the details of the situation, I have caused the Chief of Ordnance to prepare a statement, which accompanies this.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

[Memorandum for the Secretary of War.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, January 29, 1915.

Subject: Legislation in bill H. R. 29347, against time study and premium payments at Government establishments.

1. The prohibition in this legislation relates to two features of the system of scientific management which has been in practice at the Watertown Arsenal, Mass., for something over five years. The first feature which is prohibited, time study, is a method of determining by careful study the best manner and sequence in which a given piece of work shall be done, the most advantageous way in which its expeditious performance can be accomplished, and the time in which it can reasonably be expected to be done. Based upon the results of time study an instruction card is issued to any workman who may be engaged upon the work studied, and he is told that if he follows the instructions carefully and industriously he can probably do the work in the time which has been arrived at, and in that case he will be given a premium, over and above his regular wages, amounting to one-third of these wages, or a less premium for measurably approaching this time; his regular wages not being subject to reduction in any case, being fixed at the prevailing rate of the vicinity for work of like character. This payment of premium is the second feature which is prohibited by the legislation in the bill. No watch is held over a workman otherwise than during the time study mentioned, and no workman is subjected to any timing process for the purpose of ascertaining whether he is working industriously. Time studies are made only occasionally, and as information accumulates which is available for use in arriving at the time in which work can reasonably be done, its employment is of diminishing frequency. All allowances are made so as to insure that work shall not be expected at a rate which is irksome, or even disagreeable, to the workman.

2. There are other important features of the system of management which relate to systemization, orderly procedure, and efficient arrangement, not having relation to the care and attention which is expected from a workman or to any stimulus to industry upon his part; but the features now proposed to be prohibited are the only ones by which the workman is let in to a share in the economy which results from better management accompanying the system.

3. A monthly report is made from the Watertown Arsenal of the amount of work which has been done upon the premium system and the premiums which are earned thereon. The latest report which has been received, which is for the month of November last, shows that 33 per cent of all the work done at the arsenal in that month was in accordance with this system, and that the total amount of premium was $2,519.69. The shop in which were the greatest number of men who had premium work was the machine shop, and in this about 70 per cent of all the work done was on the premium system, and the average premium earned by the machinists for the time that they were working on premium jobs was 24.12 per cent of their regular pay. It will be observed that the premiums paid during this period were at the rate of about $40,000 a year, and as there are in the neighborhood of 600 employees at the arsenal, it follows that the wages of all were increased on an average by about $66 a year. Premium payments, but not time studies, are made also at the Frankford Arsenal, in Philadelphia, Pa.; and at that establishment these payments amount to about $45,000 a year. As stated above, these premiums are over and above the regular day wages of the employees, which are fixed by the rule that they shall be the same as those paid in the vicinity for work of like character, and which have not been diminished since the commencement of the application of the premium system of payment; so that the charge that this system results in a demand for higher speed on the part of the workman without any ultimate increase of wages has no foundation in the now well-established practice at these arsenals. I inclose a copy of the report from the Watertown Arsenal which is referred to in this paragraph, which shows the name of every workman who was employed upon a premium job during any part of the first 23 days of last November; the time which he worked upon such job; the amount of premium which he earned, and the ratio which this premium bore to his regular wages. There is also shown the average premium earned in each shop and the percentage of the total work in the shop which was done under the premium system. It appears that the total sum paid in premiums during these 23 days (19 working days) was $2,519.69; that the total number of employees who received premiums was 340; so that the average premium earned by each was $7.41, and the average daily premium $0.39 each.

4. The workings of the system, the economies effected, and the advantage to the workman are set forth in the reports of the Chief of Ordnance for the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914. The extracts from these reports for the years 1911 and 1912 which relate to this subject are published in an appendix to the report of the Chief of Ordnance for the year 1913, together with certain petitions of a number of the workmen at the Watertown Arsenal against this system, and the replies of the Chief of Ordnance thereto. A copy of this appendix is inclosed herewith, and there are also inclosed copies of the reports for the years 1913 and 1914. I invite special attention to these reports, as the subject can not be fully understood without knowing what is in them. They exhibit a high degree of advantage for the workman and such economy of manufacture for the Government that it seems inevitable that, if the economy is reduced, as it appears certain that it will be if the proposed legislation becomes effective, larger sums will be required for the operation of the arsenals.

THE TAYLOR SYSTEM OF SHOP MANAGEMENT AT THE WATERTOWN ARSENAL.

WATERTOWN ARSENAL, June 21, 1913.

Hon. LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the representatives of the different trade unions employed at this arsenal in the various departments, do hereby request and petition you to abolish the stop-watch system, because of the unfair and unreasonable methods, which are described in the following:

This in the machine shop: A third-class machinist, rated at $2.56 per day, for instance, working on a job, the stop-watch premium makes his appearance and makes a time study of operations, etc. He goes back to his desk and juggles figures for a while, and he is given a long time and a short time to finish the job. Sometimes he makes the time reasonable, and other times he is a long way off. This third-class man may make a premium of 80 cents to $1 per day. But it must be borne in mind that he is only capable of running one kind of a machine, whereas a first-class man, rated at $3.52 per day (this arsenal is depending on first-class work), can operate any machine, and this time study or stop watch is not put on the job. You can therefore see the unfairness of this premium system toward a first and third class machinist.

Another case is of a man getting $3.52 per day and running a large machine. Where it requires so much time to finish a large piece he generally has those pieces on premium from 1 to 6 to 18 months, making $26 to $32 per month, whereas a man going around the shop at the same pay working at different jobs does not get a chance at this class of work or machine, which is absolutely unfair.

It also may be seen that a man is working on a lathe, roughing a dozen pieces. He makes a full premium, which is equivalent to $1 per day above his day's pay. This job very often is taken away and given to another man to finish, which requires close and accurate work and is subject to inspection. He makes approximately 15 to 60 cents on the same job. The difference between the time study on the roughing and the finishing of the job, can be seen, is very unreliable.

Several cases in the blacksmith shop that do not work satisfactory according to the stop-watch premium:

A blacksmith had been working on several forgings and soon after he had started, he was going to be the first victim for the timepiece; forging under normal conditions had been completed and the blacksmith's estimated time for this piece of work was 8 hours and 20 minutes. The stop-watch man made a time study of operations; went away and juggled figures for a while, came back and set the total time for the completion of this piece of work six hours, which was impossible for him to do.

Another blacksmith had a much more trying period with the stop-watch premium system. He was about to start on several forgings and the stop-watch man appeared to make a time study of the job to be completed. The blacksmith evidently was not accustomed to this way of doing business. He put a piece of steel into the fire until it was hot and then started to forge the piece with his helper. The stop-watch man told him to put another piece in the fire while working and he positively refused. The foreman and officer in charge of the shop were notified and came to investigate the matter.

The stop-watch man told the blacksmith there was no need of his being there then. The blacksmith then told him he did not know why he was there, but that he, the blacksmith, did know the reason of the stop-watch man being present there. Finally the blacksmith went out, saying, "No stop watch for me; I have always done a day's work for the Government and always will as long as I work in this arsenal."

The system in the foundry has not been carried out as promised. In addition to the speeding up of men, there has been a continual cutting in the time of similar articles. It is not a question in the minds of those in charge of what a job is worth, but is based upon the quickest time that one can make, and in nearly every case where fault has been found by the workman in regard to time he was told that it was the time set and not satisfaction given whatsoever in this department that it is impossible to keep or to get a sufficient number of laborers owing to the abnormal pace which they are expected to go. This department has unanimously petitioned this continuance of a system.

Take a painter's case, for instance; two men taken from the yard laboring gang were placed upon a job painting shot and shell together with all templets and instructions For doing the work they are rated at $1.84 per day. The stop-watch premium was advised, therefore they received from 60 to 70 cents, added on to their regular day's pay on account of the premium, and one of the regular painters was suspended for lack of work, whereas if this man was given the work through the regular channels there would be no need of suspension. Whereas a great deal more work would be accomplished by so doing and the other painters would not have to stop their regular work to mix paint for the laboring men from the yard.

The conditions of the stop-watch premium in the carpenter shop are equal to those in the machine department. For instance, a man started to work recently repairing old shot and shell boxes. The work did not require a very skillful man and the stop watch was introduced. This man got 60 cents over his day's pay. It must be taken into consideration that there are first-class men in this woodworking department such as cabinetmakers, pattern makers, and wood turners, whereas it may be seen that the third-class rated man gets more money than the first-class mechanic by this unfair method.

Referring to the laborer in the yard, for instance, a time study has been made between shops and buildings, it is expected that the man shall make the same time from day to day irrespective of load or the animal, with no allowance for the conditions of the weather whatsoever. Again, if a carload of pig iron arrives at this arsenal with approximately 40 tons on board, it is to be unloaded by stop-watch premium. For instance, a car with sideboards measuring 4 feet high is expected to be unloaded just as quickly as a car with 18-inch sideboards, which is utterly impossible. On a recent occasion, a man with a horse and team entered the foundry to clean up waste material, such as slag iron and sand which were unfit for use. They usually use an ordinary shovel with a capacity of 21 pounds, which is described in the so-called Taylor book. He was told by the stop-watch man to use a scoop shovel which has a capacity of 40 pounds, and the foreman of the yard arrived on the job and told him it was not fit for any white man to use on that class of work. The team was loaded, however, with the usual shovel and went on its way to the dumping place. The stop-watch man told the foreman in a very sarcastic manner that he should not talk that way before the men to him. Whereas it may be seen that his sole object was to push the man to the dead limit simply because he was a laborer, irrespective of the size of the shovel or the nature of the work.

Referring to the accidents: A great many are caused by this continual driving from day to day. It also may be seen that the majority of men are failing in health. Whereas it is absolutely impossible for a man to work and do justice to himself or the work which is required of him on account of the stop-watch premium system. More than 75 per cent of accidents has taken place this year than the previous year of which a very careful record has been made from time to time in all departments. It may also be seen that the bad work and rejections are greater than ever before by 100 per cent. Below is a list of the names of the representative mechanics of their respective departments. Machine shop, A. J. Coyle; blacksmith shop, Matthew T. Glynn; foundry, Joseph R Cooney; pattern, James B. Cunningham; carpenter, Eugene P. Gingras; paint, H. A. Gildersleeve; yard laboring, Peter Kidbride.

Respectfully, yours,

MAURICE W. BOWEN,
Chairman Representative Committee,
23 Charles Street, Auburndale, Mass.

WATERTOWN ARSENAL, June 17, 1913.

Hon. LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, employees of the Government, representing 349 of a total of 373 hands employed in the various departments as indicated hereon, respectfully petition that the Taylor system, now in operation at this arsenal, be immediately discontinued for the reasons as hereinafter set forth.

We object to the use of the stop watch, as it is used as a means of speeding men up to a point beyond their normal capacity. It is humiliating and savors too much of the slave driver.

A comparison of the record of serious accidents occurring in the works since the introduction of the stop-watch premium system will convince the most skeptical that it is dangerous to limb and life, and we claim that a large percentage of these acidents are the direct result of the driving system in vogue at this plant.

We believe that this system, instead of producing what was claimed it would produce—high wages to employees, with a low cost of production—has worked exactly opposite, inasmuch as the investigation into the wages paid (outside of premium) will show that there has been no material increase in wages, while the cost of production has been increased to such an extent that large deficits are being reported on nearly every job of any consequence that is done at this arsenal.

The number of nonproductive employees in proportion to the productive employees who are necessary to carry out the details of the system has been largely responsible in the great increase in overhead expense, which in many cases has resulted in the Government being unable to compete with outside concerns and has resulted in contracts being placed with outside parties to do work which the arsenal is equipped to do and which, under normal conditions, could be done at a cost considerably under that charged by the contractor securing the work. For instance, it has become the practice to let large contracts for manufacturing patterns which the arsenal is equipped to manufacture and could manufacture at a figure considerably below that charged by outside concerns the quality of work being considered, were it not burdened by an excessive overhead charge which must be carried to pay an abnormal nonproductive force of employees.

We cite the above case to show that there is ground for our belief that the continuance of this system would finally eventuate in closing this arsenal as a manufacturing plant.

A large corps of inspectors are kept busy examining and rejecting material, and the number of pieces rejected since the premium system was inaugurated has increased by a large percentage. The number of parts rejected since the system was installed will run well into the thousands.

The effect of this system here has been to create a feeling of distrust between the employees and the management; it has destroyed every vestige of cooperation between the workmen and the foremen collectively, and has produced a condition of unhappiness throughout the whole works.

For the reasons as stated above, as well as many others which we will not trouble with at this time, we respectfully pray that you, as head of the War Department, take such immediate steps as will effectually remove this system from Watertown Arsenal and restore the workmen to a condition similar to that enjoyed by other artisans and laborers in the public service as well as in most private manufacturing plants.

We also respectfully petition that the records as obtained by means of stop-watch observation be removed from this arsenal or destroyed altogether, as they do not represent the normal time in which given work should be accomplished, but rather they are the product of the "speed-up" system which has resulted in accidents, inferior work, and numerous abuses such as no American citizen should be called upon to endure.

In conclusion, let it be understood that the signatures to this petition were not obtained by coercion or unfair means, and each individual signing this petition does so of his own free will and accord.

Respectfully submitted.

MAURICE W. BOWEN,
Chairman Representative Committee,
23 Charles Street, Auburndale, Mass.

Signed by 51 molders and helpers; 25 pattern makers, carpenters, and painters; 17 blacksmiths and helpers; 53 yard-laboring men; 88 machinists and helpers, assembling department; 88 machinists and helpers.

[Memorandum for the Secretary of War.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, September 6, 1913.

Subject: Petitions of Watertown Arsenal employees against certain features of the Taylor system of shop management.

1. These petitions were referred to this office accompanied by certain questions in regard to the Taylor system of scientific shop management. These questions will be answered in their order.

Question 1. "Exact figures of everything going into the matter of cost; that is, all expenses upon which cost prices should be figured."

Depending upon the use which is to be made of the figures there are three general classes of costs of articles procured for the public service by the Ordnance Department. These can be called—

(a) The appropriation cost;
(b) The arsenal cost; and
(c) The War Department cost.

2. The appropriation cost includes all expenditures made out of the appropriations for procuring the article, either by manufacture or purchase, such as those made for labor, material, civilian superintendence, power, heat, light, clerical work, drafting, current repairs, leaves and holidays, disabilities, etc.

3. The arsenal cost is the appropriation cost with what is known as the "arsenal burden" added. The arsenal burden is composed of items which increase the cost of the article at the establishment where it is procured, but are not paid for from the congressional appropriation which is made directly for procuring the article, such as interest on the value of the plant, depreciation, allowance for fire losses, pay of officers and enlisted men, etc.

4. The War Department cost is the arsenal cost with the addition of the "War Department burden." The War Department burden comprises the proportion of the expense of maintaining the War Department proper which is rightfully chargeable to the manufacturing operations of the Ordnance Department. It is composed of the proper proportion of items, such as salaries in the office of the Secretary of War and in the various bureaus of the War Department, contingent expenses of the War Department, rent of buildings for the War Department, expenses of the office of the Chief of Ordnance chargeable to manufacturing operations, pay of retired officers and enlisted men of the Ordnance Department, etc.

5. The appropriation cost is the only one with which these petitions are concerned, since the statements made therein relate to comparative costs of manufacture before and since the introduction at the Watertown Arsenal of the time-study and premium features of the Taylor system. The arsenal cost is generally used for the purpose of comparing Government manufacture, as carried on by the Ordnance Department, with private manufacture. The War Department cost is of importance when there is a question of securing reimbursement of that department for serviceable property disposed of by it in accordance with the methods authorized by law.

Question 2. "The system as now operated."

6. The Taylor system of shop management may be roughly divided into two general parts. The first part relates to the systemization of processes of manufacture, so that these processes shall be carried on in a perfectly orderly manner, with better forethought and provision than has ever before been given them, and with more detailed arrangements concerning their relations to each other. To the natural inquiry as to what there is new in this, since everybody has always been striving for system and order in manufacturing operations, the answer must be made that the amount of attention which is given under Mr. Taylor's method to system, as evidenced by the number of the personnel engaged and the expense involved—that is, by the amount of administrative energy which is devoted to it—is so different from that which has ever anywhere before his time been devoted to systemization as to be absolutely revolutionary.

7. The second part relates to the quantity of output to be obtained from the workman, and the stimulus required to induce him to cheerfully and earnestly and intelligently strive to give the output. This part rests upon the theory that the best and most expeditious way of doing a piece of work is too difficult of ascertainment for the workman who has to do it to have any reasonable chance of arriving at it; and that it must be reached through painstaking study by methods prescribed by a highly skilled and expensive specialist, utilizing measurements of the time required by the various elements of a job, and a great deal of knowledge such as the workman does not have and can not be expected to have. There is the further theory that the current rate of wages, as it exists in any manufacturing community, is not that corresponding to the best directed and most earnest efforts of the employees, but is that corresponding to the class of performance in connection with which the rate has grown up, which is very far from being the best reasonably and agreeably attainable. By expensively finding out the best method of doing a given piece of work, and the time in which it can reasonably be done by following this method, and then by making it very well worth the employee's while to approach, within a given interval, this time, or to improve upon it, means are found to improve the individual output and to improve the compensation which is paid for it in a manner profitable and satisfactory to both employer and employee.

8. For a comprehensive understanding of the system and its inauguration at the Watertown Arsenal it will be necessary to read Mr. Taylor's careful works upon Scientific Management, upon Shop Management, and upon the Art of Cutting Metal. A highly condensed exposure of the system and of the three years of its operation at the Watertown Arsenal is, however, contained in my annual reports for the fiscal years 1911 and 1912, from which the pages relating to this subject have been extracted and are attached hereto.

9. The second part of the system relating to time study of a given job and the premium offered for approaching the time thus arrived at is the part which is objected to in the petitions, being called in one of them the "stop-watch system," because a timepiece is used in studying the various component elements of a job, so as to arrive at a conclusion as to the manner in which the total time may be shortened. The process can be described as follows: A workman being employed upon a job for which it is intended to set a rate, the time-study man takes his station near him and, openly and with the full knowledge upon the part of all concerned of what he is about, proceeds to study the job by first dividing it into its different component movements and periods. He then times carefully each one of the movements and periods, usually more than once. From the data thus obtained he works out what he considers the best sequence of movements and periods, making, if possible, certain elements simultaneous which before were successive, and arrives at a complete program for performing the job and at an estimate of the time in which, by attentively following the program, the job should be completed. This time is called the "task time." It must be understood that the management has theretofore had no definite idea as to the time in which the job should be done, or that it was being done unnecessarily slowly. Knowledge has been lacking to permit an idea as to this point to be formed. Also, any unnecessary slowness is likely to have been caused as much by unscientific methods as by lack of diligence on the part of the workman. The whole object is to secure an intelligent idea of the best way to do the work and of the right time for it. Upon these two points all hands have been without reliable information.

10. After the task time has been arrived at—and it must be remembered that no necessity for unpleasant exertion is admitted in fixing the time—some stimulus in the form of increased pay is given to the workman for meeting this time, or for approaching it. The particular scheme of increase is not important, provided always that it gives an adequate reward for good effort. The scheme applied at the Watertown Arsenal is as follows: The workman is informed that his regular pay is not to be affected. He continues to receive that in any event. The task time is then increased by two-thirds, and he is told that for every minute which he saves within this increased time he will be paid, in addition to his regular pay, for half a minute, at his regular rate. From this it follows that if he completes the job in exactly the task time the increase in his pay will amount to 33⅓ per cent. No limit is placed upon the time in which he can do the work or the extra amount which he can thus earn, and it frequently happens that the task time is bettered, and more than 33⅓ per cent extra is earned.

11. The commanding officer of the Watertown Arsenal makes a report each month of the premiums earned by the employees of that establishment. A copy of his report for the month of May, 1913, is inclosed herewith. It shows that the premiums earned in that month ranged from practically nothing to $31.02, which was made by a man whose day rate was $3.52, whose total day-rate pay was $95.04, and whose premium therefore increased his pay by 35.38 per cent. It is the object of the management to have as many men as possible working under the premium system, and effort is made to enable each workman to increase his premiums to the fullest extent. There has been introduced a system of rewarding the foremen by premiums which increase with the proportion of their subordinates who are working upon premium jobs and with the amount of premiums which they earn. So that the foremen are stimulated to assign as many men as possible to jobs on which they can increase their pay in this way, and to help each one of them to the greatest possible increase. On account of the limited number of time-study men, and on account of the nature of the work, it is not possible to give all of the men premium jobs. The report for May shows that, in the foundry during that month, 13 molders out of 13 had such jobs; in the machine shop, 130 machinists out of 166, and 26 machinists' helpers out of 70; among the laborers, 22 out of 45 had such jobs; and in the carpenter shop, 5 carpenters out of 14 worked on premium jobs. The percentage in extra compensation earned by the men on premium jobs, while so working, on an average was, in the foundry, 25.24 per cent; in the machine shop, 24.69 per cent by machinists, and by machinists' helpers, 28.97 per cent; by laborers, 24.06 per cent; by teamsters, 26.35 per cent; by blacksmiths, 39.39 per cent; by blacksmiths' helpers, 39.39 per cent; and by carpenters, 61.6 per cent. In the foundry 66.95 per cent of the entire working time of the whole number of employees of the class who worked on premium jobs at all was spent on that class of jobs. For the machine shop these figures were 45.65 per cent; for the machinists' helpers, 12.83 per cent; for the laborers, 12.71 per cent; for the teamsters, 26.35 per cent; for the blacksmiths and blacksmiths' helpers, 8.81 per cent; and for the carpenters, 5.38 per cent. It will be seen that there is still much room for including more employees in the number earning premiums, and constant efforts are being made in this direction. The average premium in the month of May, of all the men earning premiums, was $8.96, which was earned by 210 men out of about 600. This average would have been greater if these men had worked on premium jobs all the time, which was not possible.

12. The extracts from my annual report show that great economy of manufacture, as well as benefit to the workmen, arises from the employment of both general parts of the Taylor system. It has been estimated, from analysis of a large number of jobs, that the increase of output, due to time study and premium payment, in a given time, is about 200 per cent. The analysis was of 39 different jobs, of which records were on hand of the time required to do them, both on the day-rate and on the premium system. In four of the cases the jobs, under the two systems, had been done by the same men, and the records showed that the time required by these men, under day work, ranged from one and a half to three and a half times the time in which they did the same jobs under the premium system, with an average of 2.72 times.

13. Perhaps something can be said on both sides of the question of stimulation by high rewards. There are in all walks of life men who wear themselves out in their effort at great accomplishment, and there are more such in a new country, where the rewards are great, than in old countries, where the more settled conditions impose narrower limitations upon what may be accomplished by strenuous and intelligent effort. It is not easy to set a point at which stimulation by high reward should cease. The Taylor system does not attempt to settle the question. But with the limitation of hours of labor in the Government service, it does not seem to be likely that workmen will be stimulated to efforts injurious to their health by rewards so great that they can not refrain from overexerting themselves in order to secure them.

14. The question remains to be answered how the process at the Watertown Arsenal differs in kind from the class known as "speeding-up," or "sweatshop," or "slave-driving" processes, so called. I take it that the essential difference lies in the character of the stimulation which is applied to increase the output. In the reprehensible methods the output of a very rapid workman is taken as the standard, and the rate set is such that this output must be reached in order to make ordinary wages. The task and the compensation are so fixed that, unless the employee puts himself under a great strain all the time he is either discharged or fails to earn a living wage. In other words, the highest possible output is demanded for what is, at best, no more than the current rate of wages. The Taylor system, on the contrary, demands the ordinary output only at the current rate of wages, and, as practiced at the Watertown Arsenal, neither effects nor threatens any reduction of the wages in vogue before the introduction of the system. The increased output is accompanied by an increase, and a very substantial increase, in the pay. And no rate is set which requires heart-breaking exertion or exertion of a character which is not agreeable, in order to increase the wages theretofore received. The management spends a great deal of money and a great deal of effort in finding out the best way to do a piece of work. It then offers the workmen an inducement to meet this by giving them the benefit of the time and money spent, in the way of information as to the best way to proceed, in order to enable them to make higher earnings. No discharges have taken place at the Watertown Arsenal because of failure to accomplish work in the time set; and no reduction of pay of any class of the employees has been put into effect since the introduction of the Taylor system. That is, all premiums earned have been over and above the wages which were being received before the system was put into effect. All of the men are informed of the system in practice at the arsenal, and all give their consent to it by being taken on. The time-study and premium features have now been in use for over two years.

15. A great deal has been made of the following statement in one of Mr. Taylor's books:

"When an establishment has reached an advanced stage of organization in many cases a fifth element should be added, namely, the task should be made so difficult that it can only be accomplished by first-class men."

This is claimed to be the "speeding-up" process, pure and simple. The statement has received some explanation by the following:

"It must be distinctly understood that in referring to the possibilities of a first-class man the writer does not mean what he can do when on a spurt or when he is overexerting himself, but what a good man can keep up for a long term of years, without injury to his health, and become happier and thrive under."

The character of the exertion is well covered by the explanation, but perhaps some relief is needed from apprehension in regard to those men who may not be the fastest workmen of their class. Of course, common sense prevents the understanding that all men must be thrown out of employment except the very best. The work must be done, and it must be done by such men as are in existence. It is not out of accord with ordinary practice, either under the Taylor system or otherwise, to have one's work done by the best workmen that one can get. Harshness of stimulation is avoided by the principle that the task must be such as he who has it to do can "become happier and thrive under." But Mr. Taylor himself has furnished an explanation of what he means by a "first-class" man. On pages 1454 et seq., volume 2, of the testimony taken by a committee of the House of Representatives to investigate the use of the Taylor and other systems at Government establishments, he says:

"I have found that an illustration often furnishes the most convincing form of definition. I want therefore to define what I mean by the words 'first class' through an illustration. To do so I am going again to use horses as an illustration, because every one of us knows a good deal about the capacity of horses, while there are very few people who have made a sufficient study of men to have the same kind of knowledge about men that we all have about horses. Now, if you have a stable, say, in the city of Washington, containing 300 or 400 horses you will have in that stable a certain number of horses which are intended especially for hauling coal wagons; you will have a certain number of trotting horses; and a certain number of saddle horses—of pleasure horses, and of ponies in that stable.

"Now, what I mean by a first-class horse to haul a coal wagon is something very simple and plain. We will all agree that a good big dray horse is a 'first-class' horse to haul a coal wagon (a horse, for instance, of the type of a Percheron). If, however, you live in a small town and have a small stable of horses, in many cases you may not have enough dray horses in your stable to haul your coal wagons, and you will have to use grocery-wagon horses and grocery wagons to haul coal in; and yet we all know that a grocery-wagon horse is not a 'first-class' horse for hauling coal, and we all know that a grocery wagon is not a 'first-class' wagon to carry coal in; but times come when we have to use a second-class horse and wagon, although we know that there is something better. It may be necessary even at times to haul coal with a trotting horse, and you may have to put your coal in a buggy under certain circumstances. But we all know that a trotting horse or a grocery horse is not a 'first-class' horse for hauling coal. In the same way, we know that a great big dray horse is not a 'first-class' horse for hauling a grocery wagon, nor is a grocery-wagon horse 'first-class' for hauling a buggy, and so right down the line.

"Now, what I mean by 'first-class' men is set before you by what I mean by 'first-class' horses. I mean that there are big powerful men suited to heavy work, just as the dray horses are suited to the coal wagon, and I would not use a man who would be 'first class' for this heavy work to do light work for which he would be second class, and which could be just as well done by a boy who is 'first class' for this work, and vice versa.

"What I want to make clear is that each type of man is 'first class' at some kind of work, and if you will hunt far enough you will find some kind of work that is especially suited to him. But if you insist, as some people in the community are insisting (to use the illustration of horses again), that a task—say, a load of coal—shall be made so light that a pony can haul it, then you are doing a fool thing, for you are substituting a 'second-class' animal (or man) to do work which manifestly should be done by a 'first-class' animal (or man). And that is what I mean by the term 'first-class man.'

"Now, there is another kind of 'second-class' horse. We all know him. Among the 'first-class' big dray horses that are hauling coal wagons you will find a few of them that will balk, a few of them that can haul, but won't haul. You will find a few of these dray horses that are so absolutely lazy that they won't haul coal wagons. And in the same way among every class of workmen we have some balky workmen—I do not mean men who are unable to do the work, but men who, physically well able to work, are simply lazy and who through no amount of teaching and instructing and through no amount of kindly treatment, can be brought into the 'first class.' That is the man whom I call 'second class.' They have the physical possibility of being 'first class,' but they obstinately refuse to be so.

"Now, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to answer your question, having clearly in mind that I have these two types of 'second-class' men in view; the one which is physically able to do the work, but who refuses to do it, and the other who is not physically or mentally fitted to do that particular kind of work, or who has not the mental caliber for this particular job. These are the two types of 'second-class' men.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then how does scientific management propose to take care of the men who are not 'first-class' men in any particular line of work?

"Mr. TAYLOR. I give it up.

"The CHAIRMAN. Scientific management has no place for such a man?

"Mr. TAYLOR. Scientific management has no place for a bird that can sing and won't sing.

"The CHAIRMAN. I am not speaking about birds at all.

"Mr. TAYLOR. No man who can work and won't work has any place under scientific management.

"The CHAIRMAN. It is not a question of a man who can work and won't work; it is a question of a man who is not 'first class' in any particular line, according to your definition.

"Mr. TAYLOR. I do not know of any such line of work. For each man some line can be found in which he is 'first class.' There is work for each type of man, just, for instance, as there is work for the dray horse and work for the trotting horse, and each of these types is first class for his particular kind of work. There is no one kind of work, however, that suits all types of men."

If, under the Taylor system, a man is not earning good premiums, there is an inducement for everybody connected with the management to try to find out the reason. And if the reason is discovered to be that he is working at a class of employment for which he is not well suited, it becomes everybody's interest to find something for him for which he is well suited and at which he can earn good premiums.

Question 3. "The result of discontinuing the system at present in operation and adopting some other system, and what other system would be recommended if the present system is abandoned."

16. As before stated, the system spoken of is the time-study and premium feature of the Taylor system. The result of discontinuing the premium feature would bring all of the employees back to the state of day-work system of payment under which they were working before the introduction of premiums, and, as a matter of course, the output would fall back to that which previously obtained. That is, the wages of the workmen now earning premiums would be reduced by amounts running up to 35.38 per cent, and averaging about 20 per cent; and the output of these workmen would be reduced about 60 per cent—this without shortening the hours of labor or improving conditions of work. The immediate reduction of the wages of those workmen who are engaged in repetition work could be avoided by substituting for the premium system of payment a piecework system, such as has been for many years satisfactorily used at various other arsenals. So far as these jobs are concerned, there would be little to choose between the premium and the piecework system of payment; but there is little repetition work at the Watertown Arsenal, and the repetition jobs now in progress would soon run out. When an attempt is made to set a rate for a new job of repetition work there is always an embarrassing lack of information upon which to base the proper rate. Usually a tentative rate is set, and when this is found unsatisfactory either to the management or the workmen, as is generally the case, it is changed, to the intense dissatisfaction of either one or the other. Cutting of rates, to meet what has been regarded as unjustifiable wages, has been a fruitful source of dissatisfaction with the piecework system, and has resulted finally, oftentimes, in a limitation of output, holding back both production and compensation. When repetition work of some classes has lasted a long time it sometimes has been found possible to secure a satisfactory and reasonable adjustment of the rate; but even under such conditions the work has proceeded a long time without the advantage, to the management and to the workmen, which would result from an intelligent time study by a skilled specialist, with the object of determining the best program. The repetition jobs at the Watertown Arsenal are too short to permit the use of a try-out method of rate setting, and it is therefore probable that when the work had so changed as to prevent the use of the information which has already been gathered the abolition of time studies would prevent the formation of new programs and the setting of rates on new jobs, and the work would revert ultimately to the day-wage conditions.

Question 4. "Specific facts with respect to all other allegations in these papers."

17. The papers consist of two petitions from workmen at the Watertown Arsenal, one dated June 21, 1913, and signed by names claimed to be those of a representative committee, and one dated June 17, 1913, signed by something over 300 employees. The petitions are fastened together, with the petition dated June 21 preceding. Taking the statements in this petition in order, and numbering them in accordance with the red-ink numbers which have been placed on the margin of the petition, they are met as follows:

Complaint No. 1: This complaint is that a low-class machinist is given opportunity of earning from 80 cents to $1 a day by making a good output. There is no claim made that the work is beyond the capacity of the low-grade machinist, and it appears to be held that the work ought to be given to a higher grade machinist, whether with or without opportunity to earn a premium is not clear, but from the statement "this time study or stop watch is not put on the job," it may be inferred that the claim is that a high-grade man should do the work and that he also should be allowed to earn the premium. On the ground that the reply is obvious none will be made to the claim that a higher grade man than is necessary should be put on the work; but a reply is needed to the inference that highly paid machinists are not allowed to earn premiums.

A partial reply is found in complaint No. 2, where it is alleged that one high-grade machinist makes a premium while another does not, and a conclusive reply is found in the inclosed statement of premiums earned during the month of May, 1913, from which it appears that premiums, and very substantial ones, were, during that month, made by 1 machinist of the $3.76-per-day grade, by 8 of the $3.52 grade, by 33 of the $3.28 grade, and by 58 of the $3.04 grade; while they were earned by only 33 of the $2.80 grade, and 7 of the $2.56 grade. It is true, however, that some of the highest paid machinists, to whom the most difficult jobs must be assigned, do not earn premiums on these jobs, for the reason that, not being intended to be repeated, they are not such as time study can be made upon and a rate for them set. Continued effort is made to so distribute the work that all machinists may have a chance at premium jobs, and when this can not be done and a low-grade man is earning more through a larger output than a higher grade man whose output can not be measured it is no more than the case which is common in industrial work of a pieceworker with no claim to skill in more than a special or narrow line, who, by special industry, is earning more than a man of much more general skill not on piecework. In either case no one is hurt, and some are benefited.

Complaint No. 2: This is a complaint that one of the high-grade machinists is making a premium while another does not have the chance. It is answered above by the statement that this can not always be prevented, but that every possible effort is made to distribute the premium jobs so that all may have a chance at them. The extent to which this effort has been successful in the machine shop is evidenced by the fact that for the months of April, May, and June last the amount of work under the premium system was 36 per cent of all the work done in that shop, including both machinists and helpers, and in the month of May the premium work was 45.65 per cent of all the work done by all machinists.

Complaint No. 3: This is a complaint that rates are so set that machinists doing the rough part makes a higher premium than the more highly skilled man doing the finishing part of the same job. No evidence is given in support of this allegation, and its general truth is denied. The rates are so set that it ought to be possible for any workman of any grade to make, without disagreeable effort, 33⅓ per cent more than his day rating, whatever the day rate may be. The day rate is, of course, determined by the class in which the man's skill causes him to be graded. Very conclusive evidence that the allegation is unfounded is contained in the statement made above as to the relative number of men of the different grades who made premiums during the month of May.

Complaint No. 4: This is a complaint that a blacksmith estimated that it would require 8 hours and 20 minutes to do a certain piece of work, while the time-study man placed the time at 6 hours, which is claimed to have been impossible to meet. Taking this complaint just as it stands, it appears that since the task time was 6 hours the time within which premiums would commence to be earned would be two-thirds greater, or 10 hours. A blacksmith doing the work in 8 hours and 20 minutes would be paid for one-half of the 1 hour and 40 minutes which he would come within the premium time; that is, he would be paid at his regular rate for 50 minutes of time, which for an ordinary blacksmith would amount to 34 cents. It is shown, therefore, that on his own estimate the blacksmith would have made about 34 cents a day extra.

In this connection the following example under the premium system is of interest: Time study was made of a job of forging 40 friction bands, after the forging had progressed through several bands. As a result of the study a rate was set requiring the pieces to be forged in 2 hours and 27 minutes each as task time, in order to earn a premium of 33⅓ per cent, or about $1.09 per day. The blacksmith completed the remaining pieces, 33, in an average of 2 hours and 12.4 minutes each, thereby earning premium of $1.39 per day, more than 33⅓ per cent. For the bands which he had forged before the time study was made he had taken 6 hours and 41 minutes each.

Complaint No. 5: This seems to be a complaint that in making time study of a job of forging some crosshead pawls for a disappearing-gun carriage, the time-study man had endeavored to have the work proceed so that a piece would be in the forge being heated while another piece was being forged; to which the smith objected. In the actual event the point was not insisted upon at the time the study was made, but in fixing the task time the ground was taken that this simultaneous work should be done; that is, a piece should be heated while another was being forged. On this assumption the task time was fixed at 1 hour and 50 minutes, corresponding to a 33⅓ per cent premium. The smith thereupon actually did the work in an average time of 1 hour and 49.5 minutes each, thus earning just over the full premium.

Complaint No. 6: This is a general complaint of speeding up in the foundry, it being charged that there has been a continual cutting in the time allowed for molding similar articles. When the premium system of payment was first started in the foundry no time studies of molding operations had been made, and as it was desired to give both the workmen and the Government the benefit of the increased production due to the stimulation of premiums as quickly as possible, existing records of time in doing jobs under the day-work system were utilized as a basis for setting rates. As was expected, and announced beforehand, many of these rates permitted the earning of abnormal premiums, and some of them did not permit earning sufficient premiums. In the cases where the premiums were too low the rates were adjusted so as to allow higher ones to be earned; but where the premiums attainable were too high the rates for these articles were not changed, and were never thereafter changed; but in setting rates later on very similar articles the experience of the previous rates was utilized so as to permit the average workman to earn the designed premium of 33⅓ per cent. An examination of the inclosed statement of premiums earned in the month of May will show that the average premium earned in the foundry was 25.24 per cent, while the satisfactory fact is also shown that over 66 per cent of all the molder's work done was on a premium basis. These figures are conclusive in showing that the molders in the foundry have had a fortunate experience.

In regard to the charge that it has been impossible to keep or to get a sufficient number of laborers in the foundry owing to the abnormal pace at which they are expected to go, it is sufficient to state that during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, only two molders were separated from the service for any cause, one having been furloughed and the other having resigned.

Complaint No. 7: This is a complaint that the work of painting shot and shell is given to selected men from the laboring gang, at $1.84 per day, with the opportunity of earnings premiums said to range from 60 to 70 cents, instead of being given to regular painters, with the result that, in one case at least, a regular painter was laid off for lack of work. Here, again, no charge is made that the laboring men were not capable of doing the work. As a matter of fact, they were capable of doing it, and did it very satisfactorily, since it was exceedingly simple work, requiring no special skill. The regular painters were used for the more appropriate work of mixing the paint and making preparation for the lower-grade men. Actually, most of the work required of the laborers was handling the projectiles, which is rough work for which they are better suited than are painters.

Complaint No. 8: This is another complaint that a man of no great skill was set at doing rather rough work, repairing old shot-and-shell boxes in this case, instead of giving it to a high-grade man. The obvious advisability of giving this kind of work to the class of man that it is stated to have been given to needs no insistence; the fair treatment of the man who did the work is evidenced from the statement in the complaint that he made 60 cents over his day's pay. That the low-class man by the methods used was enabled to make as high pay as do cabinetmakers, pattern makers, and wood turners may be a reason why efforts should be continued to get these last classes of skilled woodworkers under the premium system, but it is not a reason for discontinuing the advantage accorded the less skilled woodworker. It has not thus far been found practicable at the Watertown Arsenal to apply time study and premium system of payment to the high-grade woodworkers, but efforts to this end are continuing; that is, the management is trying to extend the benefits of the system to those who are not now enjoying them, and is not contemplating withdrawing them from the ones who now have them.

Complaint No. 9: This is a complaint that the laboring work of carting must be performed without allowance for the day, load, or animal. The carting about the establishment has been put under the premium system and the load is carefully taken into consideration, but no allowance is made for the weather. That the system does not operate unfairly is shown by the fact that in the month of May laborers working on premium jobs earned 24 per cent over and above their pay of $1.84 for the time while they were so working.

Complaint No. 10: This is a complaint that no allowance is made for the height of the sideboards in the time set for unloading a car of pig iron. This refinement has not yet been gone into, as the cars in which pig iron is received have usually sideboards of 3 feet or under. Time studies of unloading ordinary pig iron have not been made at the Watertown Arsenal, but those used in setting rates have been accumulated elsewhere by the time-study expert employed at the arsenal. In 13 instances reported there was only 1 in which a considerable premium—30 per cent in that instance—was earned. The question as to whether any very great efforts to earn premiums were made is raised by the very different lengths of time required to do apparently similar amounts of work. The subject needs more attention at the arsenal and will receive it.

Complaint No. 11: This is a complaint that the stop-watch man endeavored to prescribe the use of shovels of 40 pounds capacity instead of shovels of 21 pounds capacity in cleaning up waste material about the foundry. The point in this case is that the time-study man was trying to obtain some experimental information in regard to the use of a 40-pound shovel, and had no intention of continuing the use of this shovel for ordinary work. It appears that he did not insist upon the use of the larger shovel, and that the work went on with the smaller one. The matter is a very unimportant one; but it may be stated that on more than one occasion men have been noticed to be voluntarily using 40-pound shovels in the work referred to.

Complaint No. 12: This is a complaint that a large increase in the number of accidents is caused by the driving system. Careful record of all accidents is kept at the arsenal. Most of the accidents occur in the machine shop. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, the total number injured in this shop was 34, of which 5, or 14.7 per cent, were working on premium at the time. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, 57 persons were injured in the machine shop, of which 13, or 22.8 per cent, were premium workers. During these two years the number of workmen employed in the machine shop remained about the same, but the amount of premium work increased nearly fourfold. That is, while the amount of premium work increased about 300 per cent, the percentage of accidents to premium workers increased only 8.1. During the nine months from October to June, 1913, 33 machinists were injured, 10 of whom, or approximately 30 per cent, were premium workers. During this same period 44.8 per cent of the work in the machine shop was premium work. It thus appears that the percentage of accidents among the premium workers was less than the percentage of premium work; that is, that the greater proportion of accidents during these nine months occurred among the day workers. These figures are a conclusive refutation of the charge.

It is true that the number of accidents has increased during comparatively recent times. This increase is coincident with the better understanding of the disability act, by reason of which the employees now receive compensation for absence on account of injury, which was formerly denied them.

Complaint No. 13: This is a complaint that the majority of the men are failing in health. This is distinctly not true. There is no evidence of it, and no complaint of it. A number of men questioned on the subject denied it, no man being found who claimed or admitted that his health had been injuriously affected; and no man has personally claimed that he has been overworked. In regard to the possibility of overwork, it is at least extremely improbable. In machine work particularly, where, as stated before, most of the premium jobs are found, the machinist usually stands for a considerable time looking on while the machine is doing the work. Such a job can be divided into machine time and handling time, and the machine time can be subdivided into that in which the feed is by hand and that in which the feed is by power. It is during the time that power feed is operating that the machinists simply stand and watch the work. Ten jobs, taken at random, have been examined, and the following have been found to be the percentage which the power-feed time—that is, the resting time—is of the whole time required for the job: Job No. 1, 5.75 per cent; job No. 2, 68 per cent; job No. 3, 40 per cent; job No. 4, 58 per cent; job No. 5, 35 per cent; job No. 6, 46 per cent; job No. 7, 78 per cent; job No. 8, 71 per cent; job No. 9, 80 per cent; and job No. 10, 54 per cent. Of course, during the power-feed time, the machinist has to fix his attention upon his work; but it is not strained attention and is not of a wearing character. These figures, coupled with the facts of moderate working hours, frequent holidays, and generally good working conditions, show the practical impossibility, in the general case, of overworking a machinist.

Complaint No. 14: This is a complaint that the number of rejections for bad work is greater than ever before by at least 100 per cent. The inspection service has been improved under the Taylor system and the number of inspectors increased. Formerly it was customary to inspect only the finished pieces, and the inspectors examined only such operations as the foremen called upon them to inspect. Under the better organization of the present system inspections are prescribed in the planning room and many more operations are inspected, with the result that the standard of work is being gradually raised, and that it is much easier than formerly to fix the responsibility for spoiled work, which was then shared indefinitely by the workman, the foreman, and the inspector. An examination of the rejection reports does not indicate that there is a greater amount of spoiled work by the premium workers than by the day workers. It is also shown that the amount of spoiled work at the Watertown Arsenal is not greater than that of other establishments engaged in work of similar character, and is not inordinate. The economy of its production also indicates that fact.

18. In the petition of June 17, 1913, I have numbered the complaints, as in the previous petition, and will speak of them in order:

Complaint No. 1: This is a general complaint that the time-study system is used as a means of speeding men up abnormally; that it is humiliating and savors of the slave driver. The fact of speeding up men abnormally has been denied, and there ought to be nothing humiliating to an honest workman in an effort to arrive, by careful study, at a measure of the time required to do a given piece of work, in order to set for it a rate which is just, and at the same time enables the workman to make higher pay than ever before.

Time studies are not required for every job, nor more than once upon the same job; that is, they are comparatively infrequent. During the two years in which the process has been in operation at the Watertown Arsenal 149 men out of about 600 have had time studies made of work which they were performing. Many of these men had only one time study made of their work during the two years, and the maximum number which was made of the work of any one man was 11, and this occurred in the case of 4 men only. The average number was about three, which would mean one in about eight months. As the premium work increased, however, during the latter part of the two years, the average interval during the latter part would be correspondingly shorter.

Complaint No. 2: This complaint charges the premium system with an increase of accidents and has been answered with reference to the first petition.

Complaint No. 3: This complaint is a statement that the system has not produced the high wages promised. The complaint is that there has been no increase of wages except through premiums paid. As the only increase promised by the system is through premiums, the complaint falls to the ground. Rates of wages, as is well known, are determined by the wages paid for work of like character in the vicinity; premiums are paid as percentages on those rates. Nothing else has ever been promised, and in this respect the promise has been amply fulfilled.

The statement that the cost of production has been increased to such an extent that large deficits are being reported is the exact contrary of the fact, and in that it is made without knowledge is reckless.

Complaint No. 4: The substance of this charge is the same as that mentioned above—increased cost of production, and an illustration is given of orders placed with outside parties of patterns which could have been made at the arsenal. When orders for patterns have been placed with outside parties it has been because there were rush orders for them, which otherwise would have required an increase of the pattern-making force, which would have been only temporary. It is considered undesirable to frequently increase and reduce the force in any department, and to be detrimental in the interests of the workmen. It is true that in many of these cases, if not all of them, the estimate for the manufacture of the patterns at the arsenal was greater than the price for which the patterns were purchased. This is not as it should be, and it may perhaps be explained by the fact that it has not yet been found practicable to apply the Taylor system of shop management to the pattern shop. The statement that the overhead charges due to the system are responsible for the expense therefore falls to the ground, and the strong presumption is raised that an improvement in costs would be effected by applying to the pattern shop some of the features of the system which have been found so effective in other parts of the establishment. This charge as to the cost of patterns instead of being an arraignment of the Taylor system really constitutes an arraignment of its absence.

Complaint No. 5: This complaint concerns the number of inspections and the rejections for spoiled work, which have been dealt with above.

Complaint No. 6: This is a statement to the effect that the system is bound to destroy good feeling between the workmen and the management. All the evidence, except that of these petitions, is directly to the contrary. There is a cheerful and cordial cooperation between all parts of the establishment and of the individuals employed in it, which is markedly better than that which was apparent before the introduction of the system. The occasions on which men have to be admonished for various reasons have diminished and the cooperative efforts in pushing work along have increased, as was to have been expected when it was made to the interest of everybody to push it along.

19. So much for the specific allegations contained in the petitions. In all cases they show the complaints of injury to be without foundation, and in many cases they show that the complaint of too much premium system is really a complaint of too little of it, in that the point complained of is that somebody is given a chance at the premiums while another is not. As frequently stated in the course of this paper, efforts are made to increase the amount of premium work, and the success attained is evidenced by the fact that the amount of premium work during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, was about four times that of the preceding fiscal year. In the 17 months ended May 31, 1913, the amount of money paid out in premiums, over and above the regular wages, was $22,257.82.

20. In the face of the demonstrated advantage of the premium system to a considerable percentage of the workmen, accompanied by no compulsion to undue or disagreeable exertion and of its disadvantage to none, the question remains as to why there should come in a numerously signed petition for the abolition of the system. The statement advanced of reasons for granting the petitioners' requests are shown to have no basis in fact, in that no injustice or real hardship exists. If the reasons given for the requests are the real ones it ought therefore to be supposed that the objections would disappear upon the showing that their foundation is in error. I think the question is partially answered by the statement that in many instances the petitions do not represent the real sentiment of the persons whose names are attached to them. Upon the receipt of the petitions they were sent to the Watertown Arsenal for certain information, and there a number of the employees were examined individually as to their views. Some stated that they liked the system and had refused to sign the petition. Several stated that they did not wish to sign, but had done so under compulsion. Also it was discovered that the facts alleged in the petitions were not asserted by a considerable number of the alleged signers, since many signatures were obtained without showing the matter subscribed, to which the signatures were afterwards copied—the signers knowing only that they were opposing the Taylor system. As soon as it became known about the establishment that employees were being individually interviewed a telegram charging intimidation was sent to the local Member of Congress, and at the same time the answers received commenced to take on a uniform tone of opposition to the system. Nevertheless it must be stated that some of the workmen, including men who were earning good premiums, declared voluntarily their opposition to the system.

21. I think the petitions are due both to the coercion and the teachings of labor organizations. The coercion comes from the opposition which organized labor has always shown to the increase of the productivity of the individual, which it has fought in all the forms in which it has made its appearance, from the time of the introduction of the power loom. The fact that increased individual production redounds ultimately to the advantage of the working classes, as well as to that of everybody else, has been powerless to produce a change of attitude in this respect. In the ordinary case this is perhaps explicable by the fact that, while the ultimate advantage is demonstrated, the immediate effect is disastrous to some of the individuals involved, while an immediate remedy for the disaster has not been provided. In the instance of increased productivity at the Watertown Arsenal, however, there has been no immediate disadvantage to any class, since the substantial increase in the wages paid out has not been accompanied by any diminution of the working force.

22. From interviews with the employees I am of the opinion that the teaching of the unions at the Watertown Arsenal is that, if the men will join in the expulsion of the premium system, the political power of the unions will be sufficient and will be used to secure the same increase of pay as is had under the premium system, without the necessity of working for it. This, of course, could not be accomplished without the abandonment of the rule of the department that the wages paid at an arsenal shall be the same as those of the vicinity for work of like character. Careful examination upon this point is periodically made, and it is a fact that at the present time the wages at the Watertown Arsenal are slightly above those paid in the vicinity. Evidence as to the effect of the comparison is always welcome from the representatives of the workmen, and readjustment is willingly made when occasion for it is shown.

23. The subject of the discontinuance of the system through legislative action has been up in both Houses of Congress, in which resolutions forbidding it have been introduced and have been favorably acted upon by the committees to which they were referred. So far as I know, the committees have not taken evidence upon the subject matter of the resolutions; no one has been summoned from this department, which is the only Government organization which has introduced the system in its entirety. Pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives, a committee of that body investigated the Taylor and other systems of shop management and their application to Government work in 1911–12, and the committees reporting upon the propositions above mentioned to abolish the system made use of the report of the investigating committee, notwithstanding the fact that this report recommended that there should be no legislation upon the subject at the time. The report of the investigating committee, however, did not make a statement of what it had found at the Watertown Arsenal as a result of its investigation, but mentioned in condemnation a number of reprehensible practices which it did not find and did not say that it had found at that establishment. It is impossible to find in the report of the committee a statement of the general conditions under the system and of conclusions in regard thereto; these must be sought in reading through the three volumes of evidence taken and printed. I think it would not be difficult for you to reach a conclusion which would be satisfactory to yourself through an examination which you would have the time to make, and I entertain no doubt that, if permitted to handle the matter at the arsenal without legislative directions, I could continue its operations satisfactorily, since the leaders of disturbance could not hold the men in opposition to the manifest advantages of which they have had experience. But danger lies in congressional action, under pressure from outside the arsenal, and for the purpose of satisfying Congress and the country at large as to the advantage or disadvantage, both to the Government and to the employees, of the features complained of as in operation, I think that an investigation should be made by an authoritative body in which the country could have confidence, which should take the time necessary for the purpose, and would render a report embodying its findings as to the facts and conditions and its conclusions thereon, with its recommendations; which could be relied upon for the government of their action by those in authority who are called upon to take action in the premises and who, of course, have not the time to look thoroughly into the matter for themselves. Such a body I believe to be the Industrial Commission appointed by the President pursuant to the act approved August 23, 1912, entitled "An act to create a commission on industrial relations." I do not believe that there is any more worthy subject for the investigation of this commission than the one of modern scientific management in industrial works, of which they have now an illustration in four years' operation at a Government establishment conducted openly, under public laws and regulations, and operated with solicitude for the welfare of its employees and without profit.

24. The numerous documents containing the information from which this memorandum has been compiled are on file in this office and available for examination, but are withheld in order to diminish the size of this already bulky communication.

Respectfully.

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance.

[Extract from the Report of the Chief of Ordnance, 1911.]

SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

About three years ago the department began to devote attention to the subject of scientific management as applied to its manufacturing operations. Previously to the last fiscal year the subject has been considered more as an experimental detail of shop management, but it has now assumed sufficient importance to justify a reference to it in this report.

It is unnecessary here to attempt any detailed description of the principles of scientific management or the particular application of those principles which constitutes the Taylor system, since both have been the subject of extensive discussion in the public prints and have been very fully described in various treatises. It may be said, however, that the principles are no new discovery, nor are they claimed to be such by the advocates, and that the many details have been the subject of special and laborious attention for many years. One of the basic ideas is the application of educated and scientifically trained intelligence to those operations of manufacture which were formerly considered either as of too small importance to attract such attention or as belonging entirely to the practice of a trade, and were therefore left to the judgment or choice of those immediately and practically connected with the operations—that is, the workmen and foremen. The employees to whom these matters have heretofore been left acquired their skill not from study, but by copying the methods of their predecessors, and are not generally inclined to question the old methods. Besides, the best method of doing certain work is too difficult of ascertainment for the workman to have any chance of success in arriving at it, which has to be done by careful and scientific consideration of a number of variable elements whose successful combination is a matter of high skill and careful observation. An illustration is the process of cutting metal, a particular task involving which is usually given a workman with no other special instructions than that he is to use a particular machine and follow a drawing upon which dimensions and allowed variations therein are specified. The matters which are left to the workman's own determination are the form of cutting tool—which he usually grinds himself—the speed at which he will run the machine, the depth of the cut which he will take in removing the metal which must come off, and the feed which he will set for the travel of the tool along the piece. In determining these matters there should be taken into consideration the character of the metal upon which the work is to be done, the qualities of the steel in the cutting tool, the best length of time for the cutting tool to last without renewal, the strength of the machine, and the capacity of the belting to transmit power to it without slipping. Certain only of these elements can be known to the workman; others are without his ken and have probably been determined without consulting him, as, for instance, the appliances by which the machine is to be given its power and speed, and the specifications for the steel in the cutting tool; and the best combination so as to secure the completion of the task in the shortest possible time can only be insured by the application of recorded results of long experience and close observation of the art of cutting metals. Efficient work requires that the workman must be given the elements of speed, feed, depth of cut, and a cutting tool by some one who knows what the combination ought to be.

When the claims made by the advocates of scientific management first attracted my attention the question of the efficiency of existing shop methods was naturally raised in order to estimate the probable value of a change. It is believed that the shop methods in effect at the different arsenals were fully abreast of the best general practice in private industries of the same nature. While, therefore, the general conditions would compare favorably with commercial practice, in those arsenal shops engaged in the manufacture of small arms, ammunition, etc., where the work consists of turning out large quantities of the same pieces, the necessity for closely coordinating the successive operations and for eliminating delays had been more evident than in general machine-shop and jobbing work, more study had been given the subject, and as a result the methods there were highly developed. It may be said, in fact, that those shops have had scientific management for years and do not, therefore, appear to afford as wide a field for improvement as might be found in the others. I may also say that one of the earliest publications upon scientific management was a work entitled "The Cost of Manufactures and the Administration of Workshops," by Capt. Henry Metcalfe, an officer of the Ordnance Department, published in 1885. Of Capt. Metcalfe's work Mr. Taylor said, in 1903:

"Among the many improvements for which the originators will probably never receive the credit which they deserve may be mentioned—

* * * * * * * *

"The card system of shop returns invented and introduced as a complete system by Capt. Henry Metcalfe in the Government shops of the Frankford Arsenal. The writer appreciates the difficulty of this undertaking, as he was at the same time engaged in the slow evolution of a similar system in the Midvale Steel Works, which, however, was the result of a gradual development, instead of a complete, well thought-out invention, as was that of Capt. Metcalfe."

As a result of consideration given the subject the probability that the general machine-shop and job-work practice might be materially improved by the methods of scientific management seemed great enough to warrant a practical trial. With this object I directed, something over two years ago, the trial at the Watertown Arsenal, Mass., of some of the elementary features of what is known as the Taylor system, with the intention of testing out these features thoroughly and determining their value before proceeding further, and I employed Mr. Carl G. Barth, an expert in shop management recommended to me by Mr. Taylor, to assist us in effecting their introduction.

Mr. Barth's principal service has been the systemization of the general processes of manufacture. Under his guidance we have systematized the method of putting work into the shops, so that orders for manufacture now go from the office to the shops with a much more complete arrangement and supply than formerly of drawings, specifications, lists of parts, bills of material, and orders relating to particular parts of the structure to be produced, so that the foremen are relieved from much of the semiclerical and other office work which they used to have to do, and for which they are not well qualified and can not attend to without a neglect of other more appropriate duties.

We have systematized the work of planning the course of component parts of the structures to be manufactured through the shops of the arsenal, so that this course shall be regular and orderly, and the work shall at no time be held through the lack of some component which is not at hand when needed, and that no wasteful effects shall arise through congestion of work at particular machines, or the idleness of other machines or workmen, while waiting for the assignment of operations which should have been planned for them in advance. For this purpose there has been installed a planning room, equipped with personnel and appliances, for the regular production of what might be called the time-tables of the thousands of pieces which must travel through the pattern shop, the foundry, the forge shop, the machine shop, and the erecting shop on their way from the stage of raw material to that of finished product, without collisions or unnecessary delays. We have systematized the issue of material for manufacture from the storehouses to the shops, and have placed the task of estimating the amount of material required among the duties of persons other than those who are to make use of the material in manufacture, so as to reduce the likelihood of overestimates, to insure the possession of the material at the time when it is needed, prevent the disappearance of material while awaiting use and the duplication of issues, and to insure the return to the storehouse of surplus material, with the result of a useful reduction of the amount of material issued, and supposedly used, for particular fabrications. We have systematized the care of material in store and the accountability for it, so as to insure more frequent and accurate check of the material on hand with the clerical statement of what ought to be on hand. We have also systematized the methods of caring for machines and tools so as to preserve their efficiency; for example, the proper maintenance of the condition and tightness of the extensive system of belting, and the systematic tempering and grinding of cutting tools; and we have made such improvements in the efficiency of certain machines as to greatly increase their output. As an example of the last-mentioned item of improvement, we made such changes in the cutters and speeds of a certain gear-cutting machine as to increase its daily output nearly threefold, and this at a time when it was operating in accordance with general practice and to the satisfaction of the skilled workman who was employed at it.

The practical effect of these methods at the Watertown Arsenal has been a material reduction in the cost of general manufacture at that place. The most important manufactures at the Watertown Arsenal are seacoast gun carriages, which are large structures, with hundreds of parts, requiring many months for their completion. It is therefore difficult to give at this time many examples of the decrease of cost of production due to the improvements which have thus far been made, but the following are illustrative: Five different orders, each for 40 sets of parts for the alteration of 12-inch mortar carriages have been given in comparatively recent years. The first two orders were executed before the introduction of the improvements very summarily and partially described herein. The average cost per set of these two orders was $1,536.73. The third order was carried through after some little progress had been made in the new methods, and the cost per set under it was $1,120.32. The last two orders had the benefit of most of the improvements which have thus far been introduced, and under these the cost per set was $988.36. Another example is found in the case of 6-inch disappearing-gun carriages. Under an order for three carriages which was executed under the old system the cost of each carriage was $24,618.31. Under the new system the cost of each carriage, under an order for two, was $18,103.13. This comparison is, however, not quite accurate, since the first order had to stand the cost of the patterns, which the last order got the benefit of. This cost would, however, not have been nearly sufficient to overcome the difference in price. In the case of the parts for the mortar carriages, the direct labor cost per set was reduced from $411 for the first order of 40 to $275 for the last order, and that of the indirect labor and other shop expenses was reduced from $358 to $332. In the case of the 6-inch disappearing-gun carriages the cost of the direct labor was reduced from $10,239 to $6,949, and that of the indirect labor and other shop expenses from $10,263 to $8,956. This satisfactory result has been attained without affecting the pay of the employees or requiring special exertion by them. The previous practice at the Watertown Arsenal was the same as that still followed in practicaly all machine shops the management of which has not yet appreciated the wastage that a scientific study of the usual practice is claimed to reveal. The principal elements of this wastage include failure to appreciate and to utilize the full and efficient power of machine tools, lack of planning by which machines are frequently without work, the employment of skiled workmen instead of cheaper help to bring work to machines or to procure and grind their cutting tools, etc.

By the establishment of specified feeds and cuts the work done by the machines is increased, and by regulating the flow of work so that it shall be even and continuous, and employing laborers and messengers to supply the work and tools to the skilled workmen, the latter are able to devote the time and labor which they previously expended in other ways to work proper for their grade. Mr. Barth entered upon his employment on June 14, 1909, since which date he has given in the two years and three and one-half months intervening till September 30, 1911, 156 days of service to the arsenal, at a total cost, including his expenses, of $8,808.30.

In view of the successful results obtained at the Watertown Arsenal, in December last I decided to assemble at that arsenal a board, which included the commanding officers of the principal manufacturing arsenals, for the purpose of studying the shop methods which had there been put in practice and of determining the extent to which these methods were suitable for other arsenals.

The board of officers made a thorough study of the Watertown methods and recommended the adoption of those methods for similar work at other manufacturing arsenals, with such changes in details as local conditions seemed to require. In accordance with this recommendation preliminary steps toward introducing the methods, in so far as they are applicable, have been taken at several other arsenals. Due, it is believed to an erroneous conception of the purposes which it is intended to accomplish by these methods, the employees at one of the other arsenals to which the changes are to be applied have protested against the installation. They have been assured that this department does not contemplate the introduction of any system, or any features of a system, which is oppressive or unjust. As stated above, the features which have been in effect at the Watertown Arsenal for about two years, and which are all which it is intended to introduce at the other arsenals at the present time, do not affect the wages to be paid to employees or the exertions to be made by them.

The employees have been fully informed as to my intentions in this matter. The explanation given them should suffice to allay any apprehension that may have been aroused by a misunderstanding of the matter and induce them to await the result of the practical trial of the methods in question, with confidence that their proper interests are not endangered.

In addition to the study of methods, scientific management usually includes some plan for demonstrating to the workman that he can increase his production without unduly exerting himself, and for stimulating him to do so by offering him increased pay for such increase in output. The advocates of the Taylor system claim with great positiveness that the features of that system which do affect the employees' pay, if applied, will result in further very marked economies to the Government, accompanied by increased pay and conditions generally satisfactory to the employees. These claims they base upon the result of actual experience in shops in which the system has been put in operation. The confirmation of the claims as to the advantages of the features first installed, which the practical test at Watertown afforded, lends such force to these further claims that, in the absence of any positive evidence to the contrary, I do not think they can be disregarded by an administrative officer honestly desirous of serving the interests of the Government. Briefly stated, these features contemplate offering additional pay to workmen for work performed in the manner and sequence selected from the results of careful study and completed within the time which that study indicates as sufficient for the purpose.

The saving in time results, aside from any increased efficiency of machines, chiefly from the effect of the instructions given the workmen, by which their effort is more advantageously applied, and will involve no exhausting exertion on their part, nor such as should be disagreeable. If the work is not performed within this given time, the workman receives his regular daily pay; never less than his regular pay. The proposition is simply that if he follows his instructions and by so doing saves time, his pay will increase in proportion to the time saved. For example, a workman has been doing a piece of work in 100 minutes. After painstaking study of the job and of all the means of saving time, the man is carefully instructed as to these means, and is told that for every minute saved, within, say, 120 minutes, he will be paid for half a minute at his regular rate, in addition to his regular daily pay; and that it is thought that he can do the work in 72 minutes, for which time the increase over his regular pay will amount to 33⅓ per cent. The real point in the matter, however, is the determination, by a method of scientific common sense, of the time within which the work can and should be done, and the particular method of compensation as a stimulus for meeting this time is not important.

An application of the method described to the first employee of the Watertown Arsenal was made in May last. The circumstances are worth examining somewhat in detail, as they are illustrative of what might, at least, be accomplished by the general use of the method. The case was that of a machinist cutting gear wheels on a gear-cutting machine. It must be remembered that all the preliminary means of improving the machine had already been resorted to. It had been standardized and speeded up, and, although not a new machine, it was in as good condition as it could be for getting the best output. The man employed at it, a capable workman, well disposed to turning out a good day's work, had already cut a number of the gears, so that his ordinary rate of production was known. A careful time study had been made, and an instruction card issued to him in accordance with the methods of the Taylor system. The following figures are given as illustrating the change of output: The time which the man had occupied in cutting a gear was 329 minutes; as the result of the time study he had been told that he would be paid at his regular rate for a half minute for every minute under 300 minutes within which he would cut a gear, and that the results of the time study showed that he should cut them in 180 minutes each, in which case his premium would be 33⅓ per cent over his day rate, $3.28, which he was assured he was going to get in any event. No limit was placed upon the amount which he could earn by cutting the gears in still less time than 180 minutes each. Under these conditions the man went at the work and cut 10 gears, all that were left to be cut, in 220 minutes each, thus increasing his pay about 18 per cent over his day rate. This appears to have been a result worth attaining, and was reached, not only by stimulating the man and giving him instructions, but also by affording him all the facilities for doing the work which a careful study made had shown might be given him with advantage to the Government. The magnitude of the achievement does not yet appear in its entirety. Of the 329 minutes which had been taken previously in cutting a gear, 152 minutes was the running time of the machine, which the man could not alter, leaving 177 minutes as the handling time, occupied by the man in taking out finished gears, putting in new blanks to be cut, adjusting cutters, etc., so that the 109 minutes finally saved were out of the 177 minutes handling time. The cost of the gears before putting the man on the premium system had been, for his own labor, for the labor of his helper, for the cost of running the machine, and for indirect expenses, $4.75 each. The final cost for these same items was $3.28 each, making a saving of $1.47 per gear, or 44 per cent. For the effect on the man's pay: He cut each gear in 80 minutes less than the 300 minutes which were given him as the time within which he would be paid premium; he was therefore paid, at his rate of 41 cents per hour, for 40 minutes for each gear, and as he cut a gear in 220 minutes he thus made 40 minutes' pay, or 27 cents, every 220 minutes, which is at the rate of 7.45 cents per hour, an increase of about 18 per cent over his regular rate, which, applied to his entire day's pay, would raise it from $3.28 to $3.87.

Following the above-quoted case, and several others in the machine shop of the arsenal, an attempt was made to extend the improvement in methods to the foundry, where there was thought to be still greater opportunity for economies which would result advantageously both to the employees and to the Government. There had been no opportunity for making a time study such as had preceded the placing of some mechanics under the premium system in the machine shop, but the advantages in that shop had been so great that it was concluded that part of them could be had by placing some of the molders under the premium system, while basing the time within which premiums might be earned upon the record of preceding production. It was well known that this time was greater than it should be, but as it was intended at this time to apply it only to certain work which was not to be repeated, it was considered wise to allow the workmen the advantage of this liberal time for the sake of the economies which would also result to the Government. Several molders were given jobs under this plan; but it was not successful in getting any material reduction of the time occupied in doing the jobs, or in producing premiums for the men. A time study was therefore made upon a mold for the pommel of a packsaddle, of which a considerable number were required. Under the day-wage system a molder had been making these molds in about 53 minutes each. The time study showed that they ought to be made in 24 minutes each; and in accordance with the usual rule premiums were to commence to be earned after the time represented by the 24 minutes plus two-thirds of the 24 minutes, or 40 minutes. Both the molder and the foreman, however, thought this time was too short, and the officer in charge of the shop therefore increased it arbitrarily to 50 minutes.

However, although no objection to the time study was made at the time, on the same evening a meeting of the molders was held, and it was decided that they would not submit to the process, and when on the following day, attempt was made to carry it on with reference to another man on another job, the molders all struck, leaving their work. Their places were being filled by other men employed when, after a few days, they returned to work under the same conditions as those on account of which they had left, with the information that the whole matter would be made the subject of an investigation.

After the return of the striking molders to work the man who had been on the pommel job was again put at it and occupied the same time as before, about 53 minutes for each. One of the new men who had been taken on was therefore assigned to this job, when he made the molds at an average of 20 minutes each, the castings from them not being distinguishable from those made by the former molder. That this time of 20 minutes each was not difficult of accomplishment is shown by the fact that this man upon one occasion did a whole day's work at the rate of 16 minutes each; and on one occasion was observed to make one of the molds in 10 minutes. Also, one of the striking molders after his return made them in 28 minutes each.

When these molds were produced in 53 minutes each their labor cost, including helper and all the direct and overhead charges, was $1.17 each. When they were made in 20 minutes each this cost was reduced to 54 cents. There was thus a saving of 63 cents on each mold, and as, at the 20-minute rate, 24 molds were made per day, the net daily saving to the Government upon this one molder's job was $15.10. The pay of the time-study man, a high-priced specialist, was $15 a day, so that his entire day's pay was saved on this one job. When the molds were made at the rate of 53 minutes each, under day wages, the molder earned $3.28 per day; when they were made in 20 minutes each, under the premium plan, the molder earned $5.74 per day.

During the month of September last 29 men in the foundry and machine shop were working more or less time under the premium system. Their total pay for the time that they were so working, at their regular rate, was $1,108; the premiums which they earned amounted to $279.19. They thus increased their regular daily pay by an average of something over 25 per cent. It is a pertinent inquiry who was hurt by this process. The men were certainly benefited in their compensation. They were not required to overexert themselves, nor directed to speed up, and the best evidence obtainable is to the effect that the rate at which they worked was not such as ought to have been other than pleasant.

Up to October 1 about 120 jobs have been done under the new scheme in the machine shop, and the average premium earned by the machinists engaged upon them was a little over 21 per cent of their wages.

After the return of the molders to work, Lieut. Col. John T. Thompson, from the office of the Chief of Ordnance, was directed to proceed to the Watertown Arsenal and make an investigation of the strike and the events preceding it. From his report it appears that the objection on the part of the dissatisfied workmen is to the process of making a time study, which generally precedes the setting of a premium time upon a new job; and the underlying cause of this objection appears to be an apprehension that advantage will be taken of the knowledge gained by the time study to speed up the workmen with a temporary incentive to work fast and then to use the knowledge thus acquired to require the increased rate of production at the same old pay. Such an apprehension might well be produced by the following circular:

AFFILIATED WITH THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
OFFICE OF INTERNATIONAL PRESIDENT,
404–407 McGill Building, Washington, D. C., April 26, 1911.

Official circular No. 12.

To the order everywhere, greeting:

It has been the purpose of the grand lodge in the past to raise a warning voice whenever dangers have arisen which would affect our craft, and to point the way to safety. Through the efforts of our organization the machinists' trade has been raised to a higher level, as far as wages and conditions of labor are concerned, than otherwise would have obtained.

Wherever a high-paid class of labor exists by reason of organization and skill combined it has had the effect of stimulating the inventive genius of employers to find ways of eliminating skill and with it the high-priced mechanic and substituting common laborers with corresponding low wages.

The latest danger, and the one we propose to deal with in this letter, is the so-called Taylor system of shop management. Mr. Taylor, the originator of this system, is a former master mechanic of the Midvale Steel Co., Philadelphia, Pa., and is well qualified by disposition and education to undertake to undermine our trade. His system is very insidious in the process of installation and operation, it being his plan to install it slowly, and by a process of selecting workmen, he will have it in full operation in a shop in the time it takes him to select a body of docile, nonresisting workmen.

Mr. Taylor's system, as applied to the machinist trade, in brief, is as follows:

1. Instead of having a general foreman in a shop, he has four specialized shop foremen, each of whom performs a specified part of a foreman's job. They are called the "speed boss," "gang boss," "repair boss," and "inspector boss." These jobs are given out as plums to machinists who are willing to act as pacemakers.

2. Instead of machinists using their judgment in doing their work, Mr. Taylor has a "planning department," which furnishes the machinist with an "instruction card" similar to a drawing, telling him exactly what feeds, speeds, tools, and machines to use; how to hold the work, etc., leaving nothing to the workman's judgment. This eliminates skill and common laborers are used.

3. Instead of relying on the honor of the machinists, together with the watchfulness of the foreman as a means of getting a fair day's work from the men, Mr. Taylor holds a stop watch on the best workman while working fast, and leaves out the time on all such movements as he thinks is unnecessary. The result forms a standard for a day's work. To get a man to work at a terrific pace is his method. He solves it something like this:

(a) Offering a bonus for reaching this maximum.

(b) Standardizing the movements of a workman, thus making an automaton of him.

(c) Fining the workman all the way from 1 cent to $60.

(d) Discharging all who fail to reach the maximum pace after a trial.

(e) Discharging the dissatisfied workman, and keeping those who will do as they are told.

(f) Offering the foreman a bonus to keep the men spurred up to the top speed.

(g) Installing piecework with a differential rate per piece, thus: If the maximum day's work is 10 pieces, and the workman may get, say, 35 cents a piece, or $3.50 per day, if he succeeds in completing the entire task. If, however, he fails to finish 10 pieces, even if he misses this limit by only a fraction of 1 piece, he gets only 25 cents a piece, or less than $2.50 per day. This gives a tremendous incentive to a man to exert himself to the utmost.

4. Instead of collective bargaining, Mr. Taylor insists upon individual agreement, and any insistence on organized-labor methods will result in discharge.

Wherever this system has been tried it has resulted either in labor trouble and failure to install the system, or it has destroyed the labor organization and reduced the men to virtual slavery, and low wages, and has engendered such an air of suspicion among the men that each man regards every other man as a possible traitor and spy.

The present effort on the part of of Mr. Taylor is to have his system installed in the Government arsenals and navy yards. He has been so successful that the War Department has decided to give his system a trial. This would give his methods a tremendous advertisement, and only be a short time until all private manufacturers throughout the country would adopt his system, since with the public the Government has the reputation of being a good employer. This is but another instance in which a good reputation is exploited for a despicable purpose. We do not know what motives the War Department has in the matter, but we do know that this proposed staggering blow at labor must be met by determined resistance.

The installation of the Taylor system throughout the country means one of two things, i. e., either the machinists will succeed in destroying the usefulness of this system through resistance or it will mean the wiping out of our trade and organization, with the accompanying low wages, life-destroying hard work, long hours, and intolerable conditions generally.

It is manifestly impossible in a short letter to explain the Taylor system satisfactorily, but let this letter serve as a warning to you to prepare for the struggle. As a means of preventing the Taylor system of shop management gaining headway, we ask you to carry out the following instructions:

1. Purchase a book explaining the Taylor system.

2. Appoint a committee to read this book and report findings to the lodge.

3. Instruct the secretary or a committee to immediately write to the Secretary of War, the two United States Senators of your State, and the Congressman from your district, protesting against the installation of the Taylor system by the Government, asking the lawmakers to support any measure that may be submitted to Congress which will secure this result.

It would be well to enumerate some of the objections to the system as outlined in this letter.

We trust that you will be impressed with the importance of this matter and will see the impending danger. Act quickly.

Yours, fraternally,

JAS. O'CONNELL,
President International Association of Machinists.

This circular was issued last spring, closely following a vigorous protest of the employees of the Rock Island Arsenal against the introduction at that arsenal of the first-described part of the Taylor system which concerns systemization and general administration only, without directly affecting the employees or their compensation, and which had been shown to be so advantageous at the Watertown Arsenal, the protest being based upon the fear of what might follow.

It seems quite conceivable that men might be influenced by such publications as this, coming from organizations which they support themselves, to such an extent as to cause them to lose sight of the fact that the Government is not in the "sweatshop" business, and that there are plenty of instances in the Ordnance Department itself in which employees are continuously earning, by stimulated efforts under the piecework system, wages very considerably in excess of those paid to persons of the same degree of skill under the day-wage method.

A little inquiry would show that there are many employees in the department working at employment which can be readily learned in time very much less than that required for the apprenticeship of a machinist, for instance, who are regularly earning the wages of a good machinist paid by the day. If the employees of the Ordnance Department were left to the guidance of their own experience in Government employ, and if the leaders of labor organizations would take pains to inquire as to the promise in regard to conditions of employment which is implied in the record of labor in the Government service before taking and diffusing alarm, I believe that experiments such as the one now making at the Watertown Arsenal would be given the fair chance, which they do not have when feelings are stirred up by such circulars as the one just quoted.

As an example of what is shown by this department's record of employment: The gear-cutting machinist, whose experience has been described above, has been a regular employee of the department for a number of years. During the fiscal year ended June 30 last, in which the experience described occurred, he had been given, as usual, leave of absence with pay for 13½ days annual leave, 13 Saturday half holidays, and 7 full holidays, making 27½ days in all, for which he received $83.56, without rendering any service. For the service which he did render during the year he received $899.65. The amount which he received for no service, therefore, was a little over 9¼ per cent of that which he received for his labor; and the labor was rendered at the rate of only eight hours a day. His holiday time he was privileged to use for his own pleasure or profit. In addition he had the stability of the civil-service tenure of office; had an opportunity to take his luncheon in a clean, well-warmed, and ventilated and well-kept lunch room, where facilities were supplied for heating coffee, etc.; was able to take a shower bath at the end of his work if he wished to; and enjoyed the assurance that if disabled by his work for over 15 days he would, under the governmental liability act, be paid at his full rate for the time for which his disability should last, up to one year; or that his dependent family would be provided for at such rate in case of his being killed. With this experience I do not believe that, of his own motion, this good man would have become suddenly possessed of the fear that the spirit of his employment by the Government was to be entirely changed and that thenceforth he was to be subjected to an unendurable slave-driving process.

The theory under which the trial is being made at the Watertown Arsenal is that the current rate of wages is not a just compensation for the employees' best production, but that it is compensation for the character of production under which the rate has grown up, which is very far from the best. It is believed that better production can be had by proper care upon the part of the management, but that continued high production is impossible without correspondingly high wages. It is also considered that there are differences between men which should be taken account of in their compensation. There is not lacking evidence that these differences are not always relished by labor organizations, and that there is some tendency upon the part of members of these organizations to consider that they should be industrially as well as politically equal; and it may be that this feeling is stronger on the part of employees in a Government establishment, feeling that all men are properly equal before the law, than in private employment. I have not yet reached a conclusion as to the extension to other arsenals of the part of the Taylor system of shop management which directly affects the workmen, and I do not intend to do so in advance of further trial at the Watertown Arsenal; but I am convinced that, either by this system or by some other, it ought to be possible to secure better cooperation of the employees among themselves and between them and the management than has been had in the past. I think it ought to be possible to accomplish this by making it to the interest of as many employees as possible to call attention to any improvement which would increase their productiveness, or to any slackness which diminishes it, and I do not think that the spirit of keenness and forwardness which ought to accompany conditions of this kind would properly be described as one involving spying, or a state in which every man's hand would be against his neighbor, as has been alleged.

As to the effect upon the employment of labor which would be produced if a given amount of work were to be performed by a less number of men than had previously been required for it, it should be borne in mind that at a Government establishment the amount of work is regulated by the capacity of the establishment and the appropriations available. If by means of improved methods this department should be able to diminish the cost of military stores manufactured by it, by reason of the increased efficiency of labor or otherwise, the funds thus saved would not be turned back into the Treasury but would be used to manufacture additional stores, for which there is much need, requiring the employment of additional labor. This result would be comparable to that obtaining in private manufacture when diminished cost and price increase consumption.

In getting this system going for the last two years or more the commanding officer of the Watertown Arsenal, Lieut. Col. Charles B. Wheeler, and his first assistant, Maj. C. C. Williams, have been called upon for efforts much in excess of those corresponding to ordinary working hours, and have exhibited a degree of zeal and intelligence which merits special mention.

SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

In my report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, the subject of the application of more scientific management to the plants of the Ordnance Department was discussed at some length, and a detailed statement of the reasons that determined the trial, the extent to which the system had been introduced, the conditions under which it would be retained or extended, and the results already obtained were given.

During the past year the subject has received even greater public attention than before, so that it is deemed proper to describe the progress made and the conditions that have developed since my last annual report in greater detail than would otherwise be considered necessary.

The occurrence of the brief strike among the molders at the Watertown Arsenal, mentioned in my last annual report, was represented by the outside labor interests which had supported the strike and were encouraging opposition to the introduction of scientific management in the plants of this department as indicating the existence of unsatisfactory conditions, due to the use of the particular system of management under trial, known as the Taylor system. The representations made induced the House of Representatives to appoint a special committee to investigate the Taylor and other systems of shop management. While the resolution authorizing the appointment of the committee provided for the investigation of other systems, it specifically named the Taylor system and directed that the applicability of this system to Government works, its effect on the health and pay of the employees, and on wages and labor cost be ascertained. The special committee thus appointed began its labors on October 4, 1911. The members visited the Watertown Arsenal and held hearings there, at Boston, New York, and Washington, covering a period between October 4, 1911, and February 12, 1912. Ample opportunity was afforded to all Government officers and employees, outside labor leaders and workmen, industrial engineers, civilian managers, and generally to anyone interested in the subject, to present their views to the committee. In short, the committee went into the subject thoroughly and had presented to it in great detail all the information needed for an exhaustive study and the formation of an authoritative conclusion. The committee made its report to the House on March 9, 1912, and it was unanimous. Inasmuch as the opponents of the Taylor system had virtually concentrated their attack upon the time-study and premium features under trial at the Watertown Arsenal, claiming that those features operated against the health and well-being of the employees, it is particularly interesting to note what the committee, as the result of its investigation, had to say upon the points especially affected by those features. Their remarks were as follows:

"Neither the Taylor system, the Emerson system, the Gantt system, the Brombacher system, the Stimpson system, nor any of the systems of so-called scientific management have been in existence long enough for your committee to determine with accuracy their effect on the health and pay of employees and their effect on wages and labor cost. The conclusions we have arrived at are all based upon what we consider to be the logical sequence of the conditions existing or proposed. The selection of any system of shop management for the various Government works must be, to a great extent, a matter of administration, and your committee does not deem it advisable nor expedient to make any recommendations for legislation upon the subject at this time."

In other words, the committee, properly zealous to protect the well-being of the employees, failed to find any ground in the representations made by the opponents of the system upon which to base condemnation or serious criticism of the methods in effect or contemplated by this department, or any conditions which called for remedial legislation, although it showed its alert interest in the well-being of the workmen by mentioning and condemning many oppressive practices, which it did not find, and did not say it had found, at the arsenals of this department. This result should be sufficient to stay the campaign against the use of the Taylor system by the Government, which, on the part of its opponents, has been principally one of misrepresentation of the purposes sought and unjustified assertions as to the results which it would produce, at least until bad conditions become a fact instead of a mere prediction. Particularly have these opponents endeavored, by quoting carefully selected and therefore misleading extracts from the writings of its original advocate, to create a popular prejudice against the time-study and premium features of this system, alleging that these features are only devices for "speeding up" the workman and reducing him ultimately to the level of a "machine" or "beast of burden." The persistency with which these statements have been circulated, in the face of the failure of the committee to discover any facts which justify them, excites more than a suspicion that there is some other reason which animates the opposition than a fear that the employees of the department are going to be overworked. The following instance, which occurred at the Watertown Arsenal, well illustrates the fact that the time study is not an instrument of oppression, but that the determination of the proper quantity of work revealed by its use is advantageous to the workman, as well as to the Government, and that the department intends to act justly upon the information thus obtained. After a time study had been made on a piece of work, the workman proceeded to earn a good premium, but upon comparing the cost of the work to the Government before and after the premium system of payment it was discovered that the cost was greater afterwards than before. That is, there was no saving of time and overhead charges to compensate for the increased amount paid to the workman. The reason was that this was an exceptionally fast and skillful man, and that he had been all along giving an output corresponding to a reasonable task time without getting paid for it. In other words, he was underpaid. The time study disclosed this, and he is now being paid in accordance with his merits.

In spite of the well-grounded conclusion reached by the committee that no legislation is needed at present, interests outside of the Government service have, nevertheless, succeeded in having bills introduced into both Houses of Congress which aim to prohibit the taking of accurate time studies of operations and the payment of premiums, or extra pay, to the workmen. The effect of these bills, if enacted into law, would be to deprive the workmen of all material advantages that scientific management offers them. The attitude of the department is that improvement in industrial conditions should benefit both employer and employee. This attitude is clearly evidenced by the record that the department has made in its dealings with its employees and was given positive expression in my testimony before the special committee last January. To prevent any misunderstanding upon this point, it is considered fitting to quote that portion of the hearings which contains the expression referred to:

"Mr. TILSON. There is another question I would like to ask in regard to the system. If after a fair trial of the second part, as we have called it, of this Taylor system at Watertown Arsenal it should be found that it does not work satisfactorily to both the Government and the men, after a fair trial, so it could not be claimed on either side that it had not had a fair trial, it should be discovered that it could not be installed satisfactorily to the workmen themselves and to the management, do you believe that it would be installed at the other arsenals regardless of that fact?

"Gen. CROZIER. No, sir; it would not be my intention to install it at the other arsenals under those circumstances.

"Mr. FITZGERALD. Would it mean the elimination of that feature at the Watertown Arsenal?

"Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir; it would.

"Mr. FITZGERALD. In its entirety?

"Gen. CROZIER. Of this second part of the system?

"Mr. TILSON. Any part which did not work satisfactorily.

"Gen. CROZIER. I would not permanently continue any system that was the cause of continued discontent.

"Mr. TILSON. You regard the workmen at the Watertown Arsenal as fair-minded men—the majority of them—men who as between man and man would wish to be fair. Now, after giving it a fair trial with these men, if it engendered constant strain and you could not make any satisfactory arrangement with this system, would it not discourage it in your eyes?

"Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir; it would. After I shall have given it a fair trial, then I shall know everything about it of my own knowledge.

"Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, there are some features that might remain after this second part of the system was presumed to have been abolished, like the time records, for instance. Would workmen be required to still maintain the time as determined by the time-study methods of this system?

"Gen. CROZIER. I think I have covered that when I say that I would not continue anything that produced permanent discontent.

"Mr. TILSON. The system or any part of it?

"Gen. CROZIER. No, sir.

"Mr. TILSON. I just wanted to be sure of what you said, General. I simply wanted it reiterated, that is all.

"Gen. CROZIER. Anything that produced permanent dissatisfaction and discontent would be given up. We desire to have our relations with the workmen harmonious.

"Mr. TILSON. That's the point."

These expressions should not be misinterpreted. They do not mean that any feature deemed beneficial will be given up immediately upon the request of employees, without investigation of the grounds and reasons for such a request. Before the abandonment of a feature is decided upon it must be demonstrated that those objecting to it have worked under it long enough to understand it thoroughly, that their objections are material and based upon their own experience rather than the suggestions of others, and that they represent in number more than the small discontented element that exists in all industrial organizations.

The time study affords the most accurate measure yet devised for determining the just quantity of work that should be performed without overexertion, and the premium system is one of the means by which this just quantity of work can be adequately paid for. The combination of the two secures increased earnings to the competent workman, without a corresponding decrease to the less competent, a positive and material step forward which it would seem should meet with general approval. The proposed bills, however, take away this advantage, and require the workman to continue to labor under the old conditions, the unsatisfactory and inadequate character of which is evidenced by the symptoms of general unrest occurring throughout the industrial world.

The advocates of these bills profess to foresee that the time study and premium features will produce conditions inimical to the workman, and draw a harrowing picture of a future in which the overwrought workman is laboring feverishly to accomplish daily a task beyond his strength in return for a wage no greater, and perhaps less, than he formerly received. The absurdity of the supposition that such a state of affairs in a plant belonging to this Government would be tolerated by the people, or that there is any incentive which would lead sane Government officials to attempt anything of the sort, does not seem to strike these prophets. Neither do they appear to comprehend the fact that the determination of the rate of wages to be paid is a matter wholly independent of any system of management. The Taylor system has no occult power to force workmen to work under unsatisfactory conditions or for an inadequate wage. It does not take away from the workmen any weapon of self-protection which they now possess. Wages are not fixed by a system, but by agreement. Under the Taylor system there is exactly the same opportunity for bargaining, either individually or collectively; exactly the same remedies for oppressive conditions; in short, exactly the same protection for the workmen that there is under any other system—no more and no less. The same forces that operate now to maintain, raise, or depress the rate of wages will operate as effectively under the Taylor system, and these are the only forces that can affect the question. When the time study has revealed more accurately than mere guesswork how much work can properly be done, there still remains the question as to how much shall be paid for that work. The settlement of that question is not determined by the time study, nor by any other feature of the Taylor system. But the result of the time study has furnished the workman with a vastly better ground upon which to bargain about wages than he had when both parties were merely guessing as to the amount of a fair day's work. In the face of the actual results so far obtained, and the unequivocal statements as to the future intention of this department, the effort to protect the workmen from purely visionary dangers by depriving them of a present and very material benefit appears so strained and illogical as to suggest irresistibly either that the real reason for the effort has not been revealed or that those who profess to be so alert in protecting labor are singularly obtuse. Should they be successful in their effort to eliminate the time study and premium features, the workman who has become accustomed to receiving a substantial increase in his pay envelope under the premium system is going to find it difficult to figure out how he has been benefited when that increase is taken away from him and his hours of work are not reduced. I believe that the practical experience of the benefits of the premium system obtained by those who have worked under it during the past year will lead to a saner and more enlightened view of the subject, and develop clearly the fact that there is not, on the part of those who are personally affected, any real wish for the enactment of legislation so evidently opposed to their interests.

To show how directly and materially the premium system, based upon time study, has benefited the workman, I invite attention to the following data as to the number, trade, and grade of the employees who have worked on premium during the past year, and the average monthly percentage of their regular pay represented by the premiums earned.

Date.	Number of men.	Hours worked on premium jobs.	Hours of premium time paid for.	Premium paid.	Regular pay.	Per cent of premium.

[1] One man's time omitted on account of loss of card; time assumed.

The net result of these figures may be more significantly summarized by the statement that 153 men received during the last fiscal year a total of $6,938.43 more than they would have been paid except for the time-study and premium features. Had conditions been such that all of these men could have been employed continuously on premium jobs, the premiums earned would constitute an actual increase in their annual pay of 28.59 per cent.

These very substantial increases earned under the premium method, without complaint of undue or disagreeable exertion, can hardly be regarded by any unprejudiced person as other than a distinct improvement in the industrial position of the workmen concerned, who must have been enabled thereby to live better and to obtain for themselves and their families advantages not previously enjoyed. It is difficult to believe that these men and those dependent upon them really favor a legislative prohibition of the premium feature, which would deprive them of their new comforts and compel a return to their former scale of living. I do not believe it, but by evidence gathered on the spot, as well as by the above considerations, am convinced that a free expression of opinion by the employees of the Watertown Arsenal, if it were possible to receive it, would be strongly in favor of a continuance of the system.

The figures given above show the benefits which accrue to the workman from the Taylor system as applied at the Watertown Arsenal. It is now appropriate to consider what advantages have been secured for the Government. In my last annual report such typical examples of reduced cost of manufacture were given as were available at that time. It must be remembered that the Government lacks the simple measure of economical efficiency which a private concern possesses in its net earnings, and that a convincing and definite comparison can only be had when the same or very similar articles have been manufactured under both new and old conditions. It should not occasion surprise, therefore, that the concrete instances available are not more numerous. But while these instances are not many, they serve to indicate beyond a reasonable doubt that the methods which have been so successful in the cases cited are producing a proportionate success in the work generally. From a comparison of the job cards of about 60 different jobs, each of which was performed under both the old day-work and the premium system, it appears that the average rate of production under the premium system is about 2½ times that of day-work. Had the same number of men been working on premium work throughout the year as were employed on such work during May and June at the Watertown Arsenal, there would have been a total net saving to the Government of $100,095.80. Inasmuch, however, as the number in the earlier months was much smaller, the amount saved was less, and the saving actually made was $49,102.95, as compared with the amount which had been estimated that the work was going to cost.

SAVINGS FROM IMPROVED SHOP MANAGEMENT AND PREMIUM SYSTEM (EXCEPT AS NOTED) AND DISPOSITION THEREOF.

The reduced cost of production at the various ordnance establishments, due to the improved methods of manufacture and to the premium system, as previously outlined, will continue to be realized from year to year. These savings were made with practically no reduction of wages of employees; on the contrary, there were a large number of increases in day wages at all the arsenals, and the earnings of those on a piece-work or premium basis were increased considerably. These increases, of course, have been deducted from the amount of savings reported below. Due to the existence of these savings for the current fiscal year the estimates for the next fiscal year have been reduced, thus giving the most practical expression to the results obtained. The savings amounted to over $240,000, which was used to increase the amount of work done and material manufactured under the various appropriations from which the savings were made. The estimates for the manufacture of small-arms ammunition during the next fiscal year have been reduced by $150,000 below the current appropriations; but for the reduced sum just as much ammunition will be procured as would be possible under the present appropriations at the prices of a year ago. The estimate for the manufacture of small arms is $100,000 less. The number of small arms made will not be as great as under the current appropriation, but it will not be diminished in proportion to the reduction in the estimate.

These figures need little comment, and, taken in connection with those showing the increased earnings of the workmen, furnish a complete explanation and justification of the advocacy of the Taylor system by this department. The workmen have received higher wages, while the net cost of the work has been reduced, an industrial result which both employers and employees are generally desirous of achieving. So far at least the advantages anticipated for both the Government and the employees have been realized, and none of the objectionable results so confidently predicted by its opponents have developed. The present situation therefore offers every inducement for the continuance of the conservative application of the Taylor system begun by this department, and such extension of the use of those features proved to be beneficial as local conditions shall justify.

SURPLUS STOCK SAVINGS.

Inasmuch as scientific management more systematically directs greater attention to all details of manufacturing work than was previously bestowed its trial by the department led to a closer study, among other objects, of the amount and kind of material that should be kept on hand for manufacturing purposes, with the object of reducing such stock to the lowest limit consistent with efficient and economical operation. The study given this subject resulted in the adoption during the past year of a uniform system for determining the amount of stock to be carried and for providing for its replenishment. The overaccumulation of stock is easily accomplished. Material is prone to be scattered through a manufacturing establishment in unimpressive lots and to rest in out of the way places unobserved. The record of it is buried in the property return, often under a variety of half-known names, not meaning much to the clerks who handle the returns, which for the large arsenals are ponderous volumes discouraging critical examination. A careful determination under a scientific method of the proper quantity of stock to be kept on hand revealed the fact that in the case of many items the quantity had been excessive, and that the stock of those items could be greatly reduced. The process of realizing upon this surplus by using it in current manufacture was at once begun and will be continued until it is all absorbed. It will take several years to accomplish this. During the past year $122,789.61 worth of this surplus has been used. This means that the manufacture of the articles for which the surplus material was used was accomplished by the actual disbursement of $122,789.61 less than would otherwise have been required, so that that amount of money was available for additional work.

The surplus stock savings, amounting to $122,789.61, were utilized in manufacturing 2,189 additional infantry rifles and a large amount of small-arms ammunition; while $17,585.13 were turned into the Treasury, as the purpose to which this sum was applicable can be covered by other appropriations without increase. Some $17,000 of this saving is still on hand.

STOCK FUND NOT YET UTILIZED.

At the Springfield Armory there is a remaining surplus of $130,313.53 over and above that mentioned above. When future orders are received by the armory for the manufacture of arms report in each case will be promptly made to this office showing the value of the surplus material which can be utilized in such manufacture, and the allotment covering such orders will then be correspondingly reduced. This surplus consists largely of those components of the rifle which require the longest time, in the event of war, for their procurement, as, for instance, gun stocks, which should be seasoned for several years prior to use, and steel for the larger parts, as for the barrel and receiver, so that the amount of the saving does not represent a corresponding quantity of material for that number of completed rifles. It will require several years to absorb this surplus, which represents the amount by which the war reserve of material can be reduced by reason of the satisfactory store of finished rifles.

Reports have not yet been received from the other arsenals as to the resulting surpluses that will be available for such use in the stock fund. When such reports shall have been received these surpluses will be similarly utilized.

Recapitulation of savings.

Savings from improved shop management, and premium system	$240,461.93
Savings resulting from the use of surplus stock	122,789.61
Total	363,251.54

Scrap material was utilized, as usual, in the manufacture of all articles whenever possible. The value of the scrap material so utilized during the year amounts to about $212,000. Under the new stock system this scrap is now taken up at its proper value on the stock-fund account. That used in the manufacture of any article is charged against the allotment for its manufacture and credited to the stock-fund account. When the stock fund exceeds an authorized maximum the excess is turned back to this office and made available for allotment for additional manufactures.

CASH REWARDS FOR EMPLOYEES.

During the past year the subject of the desirability and justice of securing authority by which employees who were the authors of suggestions that resulted in valuable improvements or economies in manufacturing processes or plant could be adequately rewarded was taken up and a recommendation submitted to you that an effort be made to obtain the necessary legislative action.

The history of this department contains many instances of employees who have offered suggestions that resulted in material improvements and economies. Under previously existing law there was no suitable way by which the laudable interest of these employees could be properly recognized. This lack of power to reward such suggestions undoubtedly deprived the Government of much advantage that would accrue from the stimulus to the interest in their work that could otherwise be secured, and placed the Government in the unsatisfactory position of appropriating such suggestions and benefiting from them without suitable recognition of the authors. The action recommended met with your approval and the matter was submitted to Congress. The result was the passage of an act, approved July 17, 1912, which authorized the payment of periodic cash rewards for the most valuable suggestions submitted by employees. So far as I know this act is the first successful effort on the part of any executive department of the Government to recognize in a material way those praiseworthy efforts of its employees which are outside of their ordinary work and for which their regular wage can not be considered a fair compensation. In addition it affords another practical instance of the desire of this department to deal fairly with its employees and to promote that community of interest and close cooperation which both equity and efficiency demand. The necessary instructions for putting the act into effect have been issued, in accordance with which the first period within which rewards may be won will be from October 1 to December 1 of this year.

[Extract from the Report of the Chief of Ordnance.]

SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

In my annual reports for the fiscal years 1911 and 1912 I described the Taylor system of scientific management as it had been installed and put in practical operation at the Watertown Arsenal, and as certain features were in process of installation at other arsenals. The system has continued to operate well at the Watertown Arsenal, where a radical advance over the stage which its introduction has reached at the other arsenals is the application of the time study and premium features. These features have been fully described in my annual report for the fiscal year 1912; they relate to the ascertainment of the best method of doing a job of work, to the instruction of the workman in this method, and to the stimulation which is offered him for carefully following it. As there is very little repetition work at the Watertown Arsenal, and as the number of men who are capable of making time studies is limited, it is possible to have only a portion of the force at any given time engaged upon premium jobs. Effort is constantly being made, however, to increase their number, and the success which has been attained is made evident by the fact that whereas in August of 1912 only 114 men, of about 600 employed at that establishment, worked under the premium system, in the month of August, 1913, this number had been increased to 236; and while the amount paid out in premiums to these men in August, 1912, was $1,037.91, the amount so paid out in August, 1913, was $2,258.51. In the month of May, 1913, the percentage of the entire working time of the whole number of employees in the foundry, of the class who worked premium jobs at all, which was spent on such jobs was 66.95, and in the machine shop this percentage was 45.68. In the month of August, 1913, the percentage in the foundry was very nearly the same, namely, 67.18, but in the machine shop the figures advanced to 53.51 per cent. In the month of August the average premium earned by molders for the time they worked on premium jobs was 27.64 per cent of their day rate, and for the machinists this average was 26.96 per cent. The total amount paid out in premiums during the 17 months from January 1, 1912, to May 31, 1913, was something over $22,000. This was over and above the regular wages, which were the same as those in the vicinity, no reduction having been made.

It is a difficult matter to give in figures the amount of advantage which has accrued to the Government from the use of the system. None of the principal product of the arsenal which was completed during the fiscal year 1913 was identical with what had been completed during the preceding fiscal year, so that comparative costs are difficult. Also, none of the product of the arsenal is also procured from private manufacturers, so that this kind of comparison can not be had. A private establishment has very conclusive evidence as to the increase of economy and efficiency in production in the effect upon the balance of profit which is available for dividends; but this highly satisfactory method of estimating efficiency is not applicable in Government establishments. Analyses of a large number of different jobs, taken at random, made both in the fiscal years 1912 and 1913, show that the production of the individual when working under the premium system, with the rate set after careful study, is between two and a half and three times that under the ordinary daywork system. In four instances the same job was done by the same men under the two systems, and the average time taken under the daywork system was 2.72 times that taken under the premium system. It should be remembered that when time is gained in this way there is a saving not only of the pay of the workmen but also of the frequently much more considerable overhead charges. A computation might be made as to the total saving to the Government upon this basis as compared with what the cost would have been expected to be under the daywork system, but of course it could only be approximate. It might be stated, however, that there has been revoked from allotments made Watertown Arsenal for doing its work during the fiscal year 1913 the sum of $73,401.05. This is the actual saving as compared with the amount which it was estimated in advance that the work would cost. It must be remembered, however, that part of these estimates were made in expectation of the use of the system which resulted in the savings, so that it does not afford a full estimate of the value of the system as compared with an estimate of the cost which might have been made without it. At some of the other arsenals the situation is better in this respect, for the reason that similar articles are both fabricated at the arsenal and procured from private manufacturers.

At the Frankford Arsenal this is the case to a very considerable extent, and as a result it is computed that in the manufacture of Artillery ammunition and small-arms ammunition at that arsenal a saving of over $1,500,000 was made during the year as compared with what the same ammunition would have cost if procured from private establishments at the best prices which were offered. Also, in the manufacture under contract of these same two classes of ammunition, $400,000 more were paid than it would have cost to make it at the arsenal. The Taylor system, as taught by experts in shop management under this system, has not been introduced in the manufacture of Artillery ammunition or small-arms ammunition at the Frankford Arsenal, but that arsenal has for a long time practiced the piecework system of payment, has recently introduced a premium system, and has paid careful attention to the same kind of methods of efficiency as those pertaining to the Taylor system, and has had the benefit of all the assistance which could be given by the Watertown Arsenal in taking advantage of the teachings of Mr. Barth, Taylor system expert, who had been employed at the latter place.

At the Rock Island Arsenal the systemization features of Mr. Taylor's system have been in course of installation for nearly two years, and elsewhere in this report are stated comparisons of costs of the different articles fabricated as compared with former prices. The method used in getting the system going at the Rock Island Arsenal was to send one of its officers to Watertown Arsenal for the purpose of learning as much as he could absorb of the system established at the latter place. It is not claimed that in the time that this officer spent at the Watertown Arsenal he could become sufficiently master of the system as to install it in its entirety at the Rock Island Arsenal, but he has been able to carry away enough to keep the arsenal staff well employed for nearly two years in putting what he learned into effect.

At the Watervliet Arsenal similar effort has been made, but there was some disadvantage to this arsenal from the fact that the visiting officer had to leave the department through the expiration of his detail a few months after he had returned from the Watertown Arsenal. Watervliet also labors under the disadvantage of inability to compare the cost of its product with the price of private manufacturers, since the field and seacoast cannon which it constructs are not now procured from private sources, the work of the department not being sufficient to keep the arsenal going to such an extent as would be desirable.

The Springfield Armory also uses in its very efficient manufacture many of the principles of the Taylor system, although they were not obtained from Mr. Taylor or his experts, but have been applied through many years, and lately at an increasing rate, by the officers of the armory. The principal output of the armory, the caliber .30 rifle, is believed to be made with remarkable economy; but here again the most satisfactory comparison possible, namely, that with the cost of outside production, is not available, since the Government makes all of its own rifles. The manufacture of automatic pistols has, however, just been inaugurated at the armory, and in the course of a year it will be possible to make comparison of its cost with the price which is paid private manufacturers.

Operations at the Watertown Arsenal had been going on with remarkable smoothness since my last annual report, when, in June last, two petitions signed by something over 300 of its workmen were presented, asking the discontinuance of the system. The features objected to were those relating to time study and the premium system of payment. A number of complaints were instanced, but these were of such trivial and unsound nature and were so easily answered that it seems difficult to believe that they furnished the real basis for the number of signatures that were appended to the petitions. The petitions were addressed to the Secretary of War, and I have dealt with them in a memorandum which accompanies this report as Appendix I. I will not attempt to give even the substance of the memorandum, but will state its conclusion that I believe this apparent opposition to be artificially worked up by a few discontented employees, with the assistance of influence outside the arsenal, and I have recommended that the subject be investigated by the Commission on Industrial Relations appointed by the President under the act approved August 23, 1912. The War Department has accepted my recommendation and has taken steps to induce the commission to make the investigation referred to.

When, nearly two years ago, the extension of the systemization features of the Taylor system from the Watertown Arsenal to the Rock Island Arsenal was undertaken it met with strenuous opposition from a number of the employees, which opposition was fostered and to a certain extent led by officials of labor organizations outside the arsenal. Some of these officials went to the vicinity of the arsenal and used their efforts to prevent the installation of the system. Labor representatives in Washington also exerted their influence against it, and political pressure was resorted to. The opposition took the form of a stand against what is known as the "job card," which is a ticket upon which is noted the name of the job upon which a workman is employed, the name of the workman, the designation of the machine to be used, the time of starting on the job, the time of finishing it, and a few other items of information. Its object is to secure accurate record of the time required to do the work and of certain other facts, such as its inspection, etc., in order that its cost may be properly charged to the order to which it belongs, which often includes a large number of just such jobs. The opposition to the card was at the beginning of the Taylor system, whose introduction it was intended to forestall at its inception. It was not yielded to; but careful explanation of the object of the card was made, and of the fact that it had nothing to do with the subject of wages, but was intended to promote accuracy of cost keeping, and its use was insisted upon. No trouble followed, or has followed since, and the employees have learned from experience that neither this nor any other part of the system which has been introduced contains any element to their disadvantage, as was fully explained to them in the beginning.

SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

In my annual reports for the fiscal years 1911, 1912, and 1913 I have very fully set forth the experience which this department has had in the introduction of improved methods of shop operation in the various arsenals, and have described the advantages which have resulted from them, both to the Government and to the employees of the department. While systemization features have been introduced to a considerable extent in all the arsenals, the feature which relates directly to the efforts made by individual workmen and to the rewards given for good results have been applied at the Watertown Arsenal only. This feature involves what is known as "time study" of any given piece of work, the consequent fixing of a time in which it should properly be done, and the setting of a rate for reaching or approximating this time; the idea being that the Government would be benefited by an increase of individual output and the employee would be benefited by an increase in his pay. I have so fully set forth in my former reports the advantages which have resulted, both to the Government and the employees, from the use of this system that there is little left to be added, except to state in a general way that with the extension of the system, which is continually being made, the advantages have continued and increased. At the Watertown Arsenal the time study and premium features have been extended during the last fiscal year to branches of the establishment which had not previously enjoyed them and the amount of premium work in most of the individual branches has been increased. The following figures relate to the month of August, 1914:

Employees.	Number employed on premium work.	Average premium over and above the regular pay, expressed as a percentage of the latter.	Percentage of all the work done which was performed under premium.
Machinists	167	28.18	54.39
Machinists' helpers	29	28.08	12.98
Laborers	29	22.03	9.62
Carpenters	8	29.50	18.53
Blacksmiths	5	20.59	13.93
Teamsters	5	26.87	98.59
Blacksmiths' helpers	6	19.29	12.40
Carpenters' helpers	1	31.43	.31
Screw makers	1	34.16	100.00
Chippers	1	42.01	27.79
Furnace helpers	1	23.11	2.09
Steam-hammer drivers	1	27.01	3.41
Skilled workmen	1	23.16	18.19
Masons' helpers	1	28.06	35.51
Molders' helpers	3	65.38	1.74
Painters	2	10.10	11.81
Skilled laborers	2	22.74	19.79

It thus appears that during that month the 11 molders, for instance, worked, upon the whole, 77.51 per cent of their time upon premium work, and that during this time they earned over and above their daily wages a sum which amounted, as a whole, to 29.7 per cent of such wages. As their regular wages vary from $3.04 to $3.68 per day, they thus earned during 77.51 per cent of their time an extra amount per day varying from about $0.90 to $1.10.

As it is considered advantageous to have the men earn these premiums, and as the opportunities for placing men upon premium jobs can be made greater by care and attention upon the part of the foremen, and the output of the workmen and their consequent earnings can be increased by such care and attention, a system is employed of paying premiums to the foremen, which depend upon the number of their men who are given work upon premium jobs and upon the amount which is made by the men. Under this system there was paid to eight foremen, during the month of August, a sum averaging about 10 per cent of their regular wages. Including this last sum, the total amount which was paid out in premiums at the arsenal during the month of August was $2,657.29, and the total amount of time which was spent in work under the premium system was 26.25 per cent of all the working time at the arsenal during that month.

The time study of work and the accompanying premium system of payment are not liked by many of the labor organizations, and these have manifested strong hostility to the system in practice at the Watertown Arsenal and have exerted their power to stop it. Bills have been introduced in Congress to this effect, and have received the favorable report of some committees. A great many objections have been urged, some of which relate to the economical and other advantages realized by the Government and some to the effect upon the employees. The failure of advantage to the Government is not given by any committee of Congress as a reason for hostile action against the system.

The advantage has been so completely and frequently demonstrated that it need not be dwelt upon now. The disadvantage to the employees, who are held by labor organizations to be under their protection, has included two principal items: First, an employee, such as a machinist, of high grade is not given opportunities to earn premium under the system as numerous and as profitable as are those which are given to machinists of lower grade, the accompanying allegation being made that an object of the system is to do away with the high-grade machinist and substitute for him an abnormally stimulated man of lower grade, developed to great speed along one line only, and of less general value in industrial work than the higher-grade man whom he is intended to displace. The figures at the Watertown Arsenal obviate any necessity for discussion of the question of the desirability of the substitution of low-grade special workers for high-grade all-around artisans, which is a process striven for in all manufacturing operations. At the arsenal high-grade machinists receive $3.52 per day, low-grade machinists $2.56 per day, and certain machine operators $2.40 and $2.24 per day. During a certain recorded period there was paid to the high-grade machinists for their increased earnings under the premium system a sum averaging $426.14 each, which was equivalent, for each one of them, to 121 days' pay. There was paid to the low-grade machinists, the $2.56 men, a sum averaging $144.74 each, amounting to 56 days' pay; and there were paid to the $2.40 and $2.24 machine operators sums amounting, respectively, to $117.22 and $32.74 each, or 46 and 14 days' pay. The great relative advantage for the high-grade man is thus seen at a glance, and this particular charge in regard to the effect of the system is shown to be at absolute variance with the facts.

The second charge made is that the system involves the undesirable speeding up of men, stimulated by reward and punishment, to their resulting physical, mental, and moral detriment. When this charge was first made, at the beginning of the practice of the system in the Ordnance Department, it was speculative only and based upon estimates of the practice which were adduced from the reading of the writings of the advocates of the system, and it could be met only by arguments to the effect that these writings were misread and that the department had no intention of inflicting any of the evils apprehended on the workmen. The features objected to have now been in practice at the Watertown Arsenal for something over three years, and in examining the charge of disadvantage to the employees we are no longer required to deal with speculations and premises, but can appeal to a rather extensive experience, which only needs investigation for its interpretation. An investigation worthy of the name has been made by one body only, a special committee appointed by the House of Representatives about two years ago, while the practice of the system in this department was still quite new. This committee visited Watertown Arsenal and other establishments and took a great deal of testimony, which was printed in three rather large volumes. As a result of this extensive investigation the committee did not find, and did not say that it found, anything to the disadvantage of the employees in practice anywhere in the Ordnance Department. It stigmatized certain practices as undesirable, but did not state it found these practices in existence at any of the arsenals, and there is no difficulty in joining heartily in its statements in regard to them. It reported that the whole subject was at that time too new for definite conclusions in regard to it to be made, and it recommended that there should be no legislation by Congress upon the subject at that time.

Some time after the submission of this report of the committee Congress, in August, 1912, created the Commission on Industrial Relations, of which the membership was appointed and confirmed about a year later. Following the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance the subject of the practice of scientific management at the arsenals of the Ordnance Department was taken up by the commission, which now has it under examination. It has taken considerable testimony, but has not yet personally investigated any of the arsenals. In the meantime bills have been introduced in Congress hostile to the system, as above mentioned, prominent among which is one known as "H. R. 17800," introduced by Mr. DEITRICK in the House of Representatives on July 9, 1914, following other bills of substantially the same effect which had been introduced earlier. The Committee on Labor of the House has taken some testimony upon the subject of these bills and has made a report recommending legislation against the time-study and premium system. The testimony taken was not nearly as extensive as that published by the special investigating committee of the House, above mentioned, and the Committee on Labor has not visited any of the arsenals. Certain statements made in the report of the committee are so erroneous that they seem only to be accounted for by the difficulty of appreciating verbal testimony without the acquaintance with actual conditions which could only be had by a visit to the establishment concerned. For instance, it is said in the report of the committee that the system "really operates to reduce the workmen's wages, not to increase them." The figures given above in this report, and hundreds of others of like purport which are to be found in the records of this department, many of which have been published, make this statement utterly impossible of comprehension under any other explanation of it than the one which I have given in regard to the difficulty of appreciating the conditions without a personal local examination.

Since the Commission on Industrial Relations has been especially created by Congress to give attention to such questions as this one, in view of its careful selection by the President and confirmation by the Senate, and of the expense which the country is incurring in maintaining it, it seems strongly to be desired that Congress shall not take action upon a subject to which the commission is devoting an important share of its attention until after it shall have received the report and recommendation of this body which it has created as its agent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, before the Senate votes on the proposition, I wish to read a very brief letter bearing out the contentions which I made, and I did not think it would be disputed, that at the Frankford Arsenal a meeting was held in which this system was condemned and steps were taken to convey the condemnation of the employees to the Senate. The letter I have is, in effect, that a petition was mailed to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and I understood from the discussion this morning that that had been done. More than 300 men of the Watertown Arsenal petitioned the Secretary of War against this system and that petition is on file. As far as the statement of the Secretary of War is concerned, if he is anxious to wait for the report of the Industrial Commission, I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon, or any other Senator in favor of striking out the language, Why it is that no one has paid any attention to the three committee reports on this subject? Is there any more likelihood that they will pay attention to the report of the Industrial Commission than they paid to the report of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate, headed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], or the present Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, when he was a Member of the House, or with Mr. Redfield, cooperating and joining in his conclusion? Is it likely, when the reports and conclusions of those three committees were utterly ignored by Congress, that they are going to pay any attention to what the Industrial Commission may report?

I wish to correct the Senator from Oregon in one other particular. I will say, in order to relieve his mind, that the retention of this language in the bill will not interfere in any way with any system that has been established anywhere in the United States in any Government arsenal except to the extent of preventing them from paying premiums and bonuses. The system to which I called attention earlier in the day is a very complex and comprehensive method of determining the efficiency of men, every element in the man's character is taken into consideration, the way in which he works, the number of days, the time they arrive and the time they leave, so that there is absolutely no difficulty, as I have said a dozen times, in any intelligent superintendent determining whether a man is efficient or not, and in grading him according to his efficiency, and by instituting piecework for this bonus or premium system we can do what everybody here seems to want to do, give the most efficient man the most money.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has asked me a dozen questions without giving me an opportunity to answer any of them.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not intend to bring the Senator into an argument with my questions.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me answer one question.

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and as a member of any other committee of the Senate, I am not going to discharge my duties by paying attention to reports of other committees connected with other subject matters.

Mr. HUGHES. That is exactly it, and consequently the Senator need not wait until the report of the Industrial Commission.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me finish. This particular matter may have been investigated by other committees in connection with other matters, but when it comes before the Military Affairs Committee it comes before that committee with reference to the industrial work of the Government of the United States, and we are to consider it in that connection and not connected with anything else.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard
Bankhead	Gore	Nelson	Shively
Brady	Gronna	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hollis	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Hughes	Overman	Smoot
Burleigh	James	Owen	Swanson
Burton	Jones	Page	Thomas
Camden	Kern	Perkins	Thompson
Chilton	La Follette	Pittman	Tillman
Clapp	Lippitt	Pomerene	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Ransdell	Warren
du Pont.	McCumber	Root	White
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Saulsbury	Williams

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a division of the amendment, the division to be at line 21, the word "nor," separating the question of bonuses from the stop-watch provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the vote be taken on the following part of the proposed committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, where the committee proposes to strike out the proviso, divide the question so that the first question will be to strike out the following words:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I presume under the rules we would have a right to perfect the amendment before the vote is taken upon it as to whether it shall be stricken out, and I wish to propose an amendment to the first subdivision.

From the arguments I have heard here I do not find that there is any serious objection on the part of anyone to any proper method of arriving at some means of efficiency, not to follow that up by a constant watch upon the activities of workmen, but a mere means in the beginning to ascertain what is the average as to the time in which a workman under ordinary conditions will perform a given amount of work, and from that average to determine what would be the efficiency in the production of any article in our great manufactures.

Mr. President, with that in view I would suggest the following amendment to the first subdivision of the proviso, and I especially ask the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge. Add, after the word "work," in line 21, which is the end of the first subdivision, these words, "except as a temporary means of arriving at an efficient and economic method of production," so that the provision would read:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made, with a stop watch or with other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work except as a temporary means of arriving at an efficient and economic method of production.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit a question at that point?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think there would be some difficulty about the construction in practice of the use of the word "temporary" there. I think it would be claimed very quickly by those who are opposed to this provision that the test was being continued to a point where it had ceased to be temporary. Would the effect the Senator desires to produce be marred at all by striking out the word "temporary"?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would, Mr. President, because then it might possibly give the excuse to continue the system. My idea of the use of the word "temporary" is so that this expedient, if used at all, can be used only for the purpose of arriving at the time which might properly be employed in arriving at information and not for the purpose of keeping a tab continually upon the movements of the employees.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seemed to me that without the word "temporary" it could not be permanent, if it was simply as a means to establish a standard that could not be construed to give them a permanent warrant. My inquiry was directed to that point.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that it would not be construed to give them a permanent warrant, but to be doubly certain that it can not be so construed I use the word "temporary."

Mr. President, I think that anyone can understand the purpose of this amendment. There are a great many in the country who understand this time process as being one that is to be continued not for the purpose of any investigation, but for the purpose of compelling every employee to produce a given amount of work in a given time and to control his movements. Others claim that the only purpose is to give us a standard of efficiency to guide the employer in the future. In order that it may not be abused, that it may be used only as a standard of efficiency and information, and not for general use in conducting the business, I offer the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota on the table. I do that because of the time we have already consumed on the matter. The Senator from North Dakota understands the situation, I am sure, and will not be offended, but I should like to get a vote on the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the amendment is considered, where are we going to be? There is a motion to strike out, and it is now proposed to amend the part to be stricken out. How can that be done?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is not stricken out. The rule, as I understand, provides that an amendment or any portion of the bill must be perfected before it can be moved to be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the rule applicable in this case. That is the rule where there is a motion to strike out and insert. There has been no motion to strike out and insert in this instance. The question is on laying the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the first portion of the committee amendment, beginning in line 13, on page 70, and ending with the word "work," in line 21.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to lay on the table the first portion of the committee amendment striking out the House language, and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LIPPITT. What is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to lay the first portion of the committee amendment on the table.

Mr. LIPPITT. What will be the effect of that if agreed to, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The effect of laying the amendment on the table is, of course, to restore the House text. The Senator from New Jersey calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]; but to-day I received this telegram:

NEW YORK, February 23, 1915.

Senator GALLINGER, Washington, D. C.:

Whenever you desire to vote in my absence during balance of session please consider yourself released from pair.

JAMES A. O'GORMAN.

Considering myself released, I vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and on that account withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Because of my general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was in the Chamber this morning, but he being sick and desiring to leave, I agreed to pair with him on this question. Were he present, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea"; and were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (when the name of Mr. THORNTON was called). The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on account of sickness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of his absence and my having a general pair with him, I feel constrained to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is detained from the Chamber on account of sickness.

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND], on account of sickness. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I have learned that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] did not vote. Having a pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 33, as follows:

So the motion to lay the first portion of the committee amendment on the table was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the first portion of the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to say that I voted against laying the amendment of the committee on the table because I wanted to vote on the two propositions involved in the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. They have been divided.

Mr. JONES. I understand that, but I want to make a brief statement. I am opposed to the stop-watch proposition, and shall therefore vote against the committee amendment proposing to strike out the provision of the House bill. I am in favor, however, of the bonus or premium system, and therefore desire to vote in favor of the committee amendment striking out that part of the House provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first part of the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. JAMES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer of my pair as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and on that account withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). For the reason before announced, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and refrain from voting.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous roll call. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted. Having a pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. OWEN. Transferring my pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to inquire whether my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 29, as follows:

So, the first part of the committee amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the second proposition of the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with the word "nor," on line 21, page 70, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this bill be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and no claim for services performed by any person while violating this proviso shall be allowed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In that connection I should like to call attention to the fact that at some of the Government arsenals the stop-watch method of testing the capacity of the employees has already been used, and data upon which it is proposed to govern the production and pay of men have been obtained, so that the striking out of the first part of this amendment, if it had been stricken out, would not in any way have affected the application of this system in those arsenals. They have obtained the necessary data. Now, if the second part of the amendment should be retained in the law when it passes the Congress, even though the first part should be stricken out, the same identical result would be obtained as though the entire amendment were kept in the law, the result being, in my judgment, to attempt to apply the rules of machinery to flesh and blood. I do not think it is necessary to efficiency or economy. I think it is just as obnoxious as the first half, and upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the second half of this amendment.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer as heretofore, and vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). For the reasons before given I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and for that reason I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bankhead	Fletcher	Overman	Sterling
Brandegee	Gallinger	Page	Thomas
Bristow	Gore	Perkins	Townsend
Bryan	Jones	Ransdell	Warren

So the second part of the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Before the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole, I wish to say that one change in the bill necessitated a slight change in the bill as it was adopted last evening. The President of the Senate will remember the long discussion about the point of order which was sustained against a certain provision in the bill. Now I desire to move to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to on page 25, line 19, and move to amend by inserting "$450,000" instead of "$440,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was adopted will be reconsidered. The Senator from Oregon moves to amend by inserting "$450,000" instead of "$440,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On page 36, line 23, I ask to reconsider the vote whereby the numerals "$7,746,715.44" were inserted, and amend by inserting "$7,905,415.44" in lieu thereof. It is simply a transposition of figures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the total, on line 23, page 36, and insert "$7,905,415.44."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is one other amendment, Mr. President. I move to reconsider the amendment on page 43, line 9, strike out the numerals "$2,067,558.60," and amend by inserting "$2,106,058.60."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to change the total so as to read "$2,106,058.60."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, on page 69, line 8, there is an item which calls for the testing of types of armored motor cars, and appropriates $25,000 for that purpose. I am informed that the manufacturers of cars in this country are shipping them by the hundred over to Europe, and they are giving satisfactory service, and are being tested by actual combat with shot and shell. There is no information needed on the subject. We are manufacturing a type of them good enough to kill and prevent people from being killed in Europe in one of the greatest wars that has ever occurred in the history of the world. Why there should be an appropriation of $25,000 made for testing them for the information of this Government, when they are being so thoroughly tested in actual warfare, is more than I can understand. If the matter is subject to a point of order I will raise the point or order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The item was agreed to on yesterday.

Mr. LANE. I should like to have the action of the committee reconsidered, with a view to striking it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon move to reconsider?

Mr. LANE. On the statement made to me that they are being tested, that we are manufacturing them and shipping them in parts and in pieces by the hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state his point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire if the Senator from Oregon voted for that amendment?

Mr. LANE. I will say for the information of the Senator from Colorado that I went into attendance on the Committee on Indian Affairs yesterday at 10.30 in the morning, and stayed until 6 o'clock at night without any lunch, and I had no opportunity to vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think that obviates the point of order. I make that point of order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I voted for that amendment, but since that time my attention has been called to this very fact. It seems to me a most monstrous proposition. I realize very well who introduced it, and regret to move a reconsideration; but I move to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was agreed to. It was adopted on a viva voce vote.

Mr. LANE. I simply wish to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to the facts as I am told they exist. If it is true, what is the necessity of spending this money? Is it too late now, or why should it be too late, to stop what is, in my opinion, a useless expenditure under the circumstances?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will state for the benefit of my colleague that, on lines 6 and 7, there was appropriated by the House $50,000 for the purchase and manufacture of armored motor cars. If the Committee of the Whole is not sustained now, the effect of it would be to strike out the $25,000 and reinstate the $50,000. We did not have enough information to advise us that what my colleague says is warranted by the facts as to the quality and character of these armored motor cars. We did not think the Government ought to invest $50,000 for the purchase of motor cars without knowing something about them.

Mr. LANE. I should like to have that struck out, too. I assure my colleague that I am informed that we are manufacturing the best type of armored motor cars in the world, and they are being accepted by the most careful experts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. In making some examination for a speech I made here on national defense I examined into this question of motor trucks and motor cars. We have not an armored motor car in the Army; we have not a motor truck; and I was officially informed at the War Department that they had not been able yet to find a perfect truck; they were still testing them and looking for a perfect truck. Canada has bought a lot of our motor trucks for use in the field, and finds them sufficiently good for use in the field. Russia has bought more. They said in reply to that, that the trucks we have sold to Canada did not seem wholly satisfactory; and on that ground in this country, with all the automobile manufacturers we have, we are deliberately told to-day that we can not have a motor truck; we must spend $25,000, and wait a year in testing them. The money is of no consequence, but we must waste a year testing to find a suitable motor truck. Why, they have thousands of motor trucks in the armies of Europe, and we have none. Some motor trucks are better than no motor trucks; and the officers of the War Department are sitting here looking around to find the perfect truck, and in the meantime we have none.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will move, if it is in order, that the expenditure be changed and an appropriation made for the purchase of them.

Mr. LODGE. But $50,000 is nothing for a purpose of this kind.

Mr. LANE. Well, we can purchase one, or make it more. I am willing to increase the amount.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that we adopt the motion to reconsider, and then, instead of substituting $50,000 for their purchase, put in enough to purchase some.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; let us leave out this testing business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let us put in really enough to make a substantial purchase.

Mr. LODGE. Let us not pass a year in testing motor trucks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments were treated separately upon yesterday. The committee amendment striking out $50,000 was agreed to, and then the committee amendment in line 8 was adopted. Now, the question is on agreeing to the amendment in line 8 for the purchase of motor cars.

Mr. LODGE. That is, to substitute the $25,000 for the $50,000 appropriation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That leaves it all out of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. The provision for a test is out of the bill. Now it is open to amend the original clause.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair stated just a moment ago that upon yesterday the Senate treated these as two separate amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; then it can be moved and be put in in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Or a motion can be made to reconsider the first one.

Mr. LODGE. I move to reconsider that, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the first amendment.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Now, it is open to amendment to appropriate a sum for the purchase of armored cars.

Mr. LANE. I should like to make a motion that we appropriate a sum sufficient to purchase armored cars, $100,000 or $75,000, or whatever sum is agreeable to the Senate. I will say $75,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he can advise us about what the cost of a car of the character would be and then we can determine what sum we would wish to appropriate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This whole matter I might make a point of order against, but I think it is just as well to have something of this kind. It has never been estimated for, but Gen. Crozier testified as to how much armored cars would cost, as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. How much do those armored cars cost apiece, Gen. Crozier, or have you any idea of that?
> Gen. CROZIER. Well, I would have to give a rough guess. One of those chassis, I would suggest, could be obtained for something like $3,000, Maj. Hillman suggests, and he has direct charge of that subject in my office; and have you estimated on the armor, Maj. Hillman?
> Maj. HILLMAN. That costs about $1,500 more.
> Gen. CROZIER. I suppose we could get one up for $5,000.
> The CHAIRMAN. Have not the armored cars proved of very great advantage in the European war now going on?
> Gen. CROZIER. There again we are without definite information. My impression is that they have been used to a considerable extent. I know that one of the belligerent Governments has bought quite a number of them; I know, for instance, that quite a number of them have gone over to Canada from this country.

It was for that reason that, without any estimate whatsoever, we put in the appropriation for one of these machines instead of expending a lot of money on machines that the officer who has the matter in charge did not know anything about.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator have they been fully tested? Is it reliably known that they are a great success and most valuable?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Gen. Crozier says they do not know. He is the ordnance officer. He says they have been used, he understands, but he does not know with what success. Mr. President, I do not know myself. I suppose over in Europe, where they have good roads, as in France and Germany, where the roads are macadamized and have been in use for hundreds of years, they might use one; but I should like to see one jolting from here down to Appomattox or somewhere else near Washington over the roads we have.

Mr. LANE. I will say for the information of my colleague that they are making a type of car with the "caterpillar" mode of traction by which they go over rough roads and even climb over small logs.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that an appropriation of $100,000 be made.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there a motion pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There does not seem to be any pending.

Mr. WALSH. Regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to insert the sum of $100,000. I have not the bill before me, and I do not know just where to insert it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee reports to strike out lines 6 and 7 on page 69 in the following words:

> For the purchase and manufacture of armored motor cars, $50,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to read:

> For the purchase and manufacture of armored motor cars, $100,000.

Mr. WALSH. From the information given us by the chairman of the committee to the effect that no estimate has been made for this item, I make a point of order that the amendment is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. The Chair understands now that the appropriation of $50,000 is to remain in the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Under the suggestion of the Chair, if it is in order, and I assume it is, I move to strike out lines 6 and 7. It appears that we have no information concerning these cars. Of all the things we would need in war we would not need these cars until the war was upon our own soil and it would require no great length of time to get them. If we are going to use money in preparation for war we should use it for those things that it takes a long time to prepare, and especially to meet conditions upon the water. This will just result in somebody getting $50,000 and the United States Government being no better off. I therefore ask the Senate to strike it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate just voted not to strike it out.

Mr. CLAPP. I understood that we just voted not to increase it to $100,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That went out on a point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the item was left in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am altogether in error now if the question has been stated correctly. The Chair said that the amendment was divisible—that it consisted of the amendment by which a portion was stricken out and a portion inserted. We then reconsidered it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not make that statement. The Chair said on yesterday they were treated as separate amendments, and they were both agreed to on yesterday.

Mr. WALSH. I understood that then we reconsidered the second amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And then the first to-day.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear that statement, and I was watching, expecting to vote on the question at some time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to strike out from the House bill lines 6 and 7 on page 69.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending question now, as to whether the Senate will agree to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer as heretofore, and vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 27, as follows:

JOHN WALTER SMITH,
LUKE LEA,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT N. PAGE,
T. U. SISSON,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, from the reading of the report it was impossible to get any idea of what has really been done. It seems to me it ought to be printed, so as to give us an opportunity to compare it with the bill as passed by the Senate. There were a number of items in the bill in regard to which many Senators were very much interested, among whom are Senators who are not present at this time. I do not think we ought to take action upon it without knowing what we are doing.

I ask that the conference report may be printed and lie over for one day.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator that it is very important that the conference report should be disposed of, in order that the House of Representatives may know what to do. Most of these matters have been before the Senate in the District bill. I know of nothing new that has been put in that has not been in one or the other of the bills, except, I think, as regards the appointment of the members of the board of education of the District of Columbia. It was the opinion of the conference committee that the present method of appointment was unsatisfactory, for the reason that the board seemed to have nobody to whom to report. The judges make the appointments at present, and we felt that there had not been sufficient reports made by the school board to show what is going on in the management of the schools. We felt that there ought to be somebody to whom they would be responsible, and we put in this provision requiring that the appointments should be made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. We felt that it was in the interest of the schools. In my own State it was once the rule for the judges to appoint the members of the board of education, and it was found very unsatisfactory. The judges here do not wish to make the appointments. They have objected to making them.

Mr. THOMAS. I must join the Senator from New York and ask that the report may be printed so that we can consider it prior to acting upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I likewise join the Senators, and appeal to the chairman of the committee to let the matter go over and be printed. It is a proper request. While we would like very much to facilitate its consideration, and it is desirable that it should be disposed of as speedily as possible, I think the request that it go over should be granted.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. If Senators desire an opportunity to examine it further, of course I shall make no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that will facilitate the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it is very possible.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Senators recognize as well as I do the importance of a speedy disposition of the matter. We have but a few days remaining, and this matter will have to be acted upon by the House. Of course, I offer no objection, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be printed and lie over.

LAWS RELATING TO THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 7041) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is the motion made by the Senator from Georgia at this time debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is after 2 o'clock, and it is debatable.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I, of course, do not know how much time the Senate cares to devote to anything just now except the appropriation bills, but the bill which the Senator from Georgia proposes to bring up will lead to some debate, and, I doubt not, some considerable debate, involving the broad general question that it does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Gallinger	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Gronna	Overman	Stephenson
Bristow	Hughes	Owen	Sterling
Bryan	James	Page	Swanson
Burleigh	Johnson	Perkins	Thomas
Burton	Jones	Pittman	Tillman
Camden	Kern	Poindexter	Townsend
Chamberlain	La Follette	Pomerene	Vardaman
Chilton	Lane	Ransdell	Walsh
Clapp	Lodge	Saulsbury	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Shafroth	Weeks
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	White
Dillingham	Myers	Shively	Williams
du Pont	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 7041?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What length of time does the Senator think would be taken up in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, Mr. President, I could not say as to that. I want to give, just in perhaps three minutes, my reason for saying why I think the bill ought not to be taken up at this time for discussion. I do not think the Senate ought to enter upon a discussion of the bill now, because, so far as I have been able to ascertain, we have not as yet sufficient information to justify the broad action which this bill demands. I do not know what information other Senators may have, but I know that the report of the committee gives no information. I know that I have, through inquiry by the committee, attempted to gain information, which I have not been able to gain; and I do not think anybody can tell how many additional

United States judges we shall have to provide for within the next two or three years. We know how many we would have to provide for, perhaps, at once; but within the next two or three years it is virtually a compulsory-retirement law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that the Judiciary Committee at its last meeting made two or three amendments to the bill. They are amendments which have been agreed upon by the Judiciary Committee of the other House, and the bill has been unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House. The first amendment suggested by the committee is, on page 3, line 4, after the word "President," where this language is to be inserted: "if in his opinion the public good so requires." Again——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not suppose the President would do it in any event if the public good did not require it. It is only a permissive power anyway.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The view was that he should not do it as a matter of course, but that he should only do it where the public good required it. The House committee put in that language.

The committee also, in the second paragraph, where the power of appointment was given, put in the language "if in his opinion the public good so requires."

As I have stated, the bill has been reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee of the House with those two amendments, and one other amendment that simply more clearly states the meaning of the bill as we intend it. Those amendments were submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate last Monday—the Senator from Wyoming was not present—and I was directed by the Judiciary Committee to ask the Senate to amend our amendment with this language.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if there has yet been any reply to the inquiry made by the Judiciary Committee of the Department of Justice as to how many additional judges this bill would provide for within the next five years?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We asked for the names of the judges between 65 and 70 years of age, and they have furnished us such a list.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Did they also furnish a list of judges over 70 years of age?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; we have that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Can the Senator from Georgia state how many judges there are between 65 and 70 years of age? I confess that I am a little bit surprised at the Senator's statement, because I was the one who wanted that information most directly, and it has never been drawn to my attention.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Wyoming was not at the committee meeting when we received it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Can the Senator tell how many such judges there are?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My recollection is that there are 8. There are fewer between 65 and 70 years of age than there are over 70.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are some 12 or 14 judges over 70 years of age?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I have the names of those.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, Mr. President, I think it is well shown that this is a bill of very great importance. We passed a bill here the other day providing for a particular emergency in the State of the Senator from Georgia, and I think that bill was properly passed, because the emergency existed; but here is a sweeping bill which provides that when a Federal judge arrives at the age of 70 years, the retiring age, having served 10 years, he shall virtually be retired; that is, no matter how well able the present incumbent may be to transact the business, an additional judge shall be appointed, for when you give the President the power of appointing a Federal judge, that Federal judge is always going to be appointed. Here we are padding the Federal courts with additional judges to take the place of men who are well qualified by years of experience and by their physical vigor to carry on the business of their districts; and we are putting in new men. We say a new man shall conduct all the work of the district and that the old man shall continue in the service, to be assigned to such points as certain statutory judges may assign to him.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is time, no matter how many offices we may create—let us go into the departmental service and create offices, but, for heaven's sake, do not let us make the office of the judge at this time the prey for political appointments. That is all it would amount to, Mr. President.

I concede that quite frequently, or at times at least, judges continue to exercise the duties of their judicial office and decline to retire when perhaps they ought to retire. We have met such an emergency in many cases; we met it the other day in Georgia, where we provided an additional judge to assist in the business; but where we say that in every district of the United States, in every circuit of the United States, and in the courts of appeal, where a man shall have arrived at the age of 70 years and have served 10 years, no matter what his physical or mental capacity may be, an additional judge shall then be appointed, it seems to me we are going a long way in the direction of providing offices for the "faithful."

I have not a doubt but that any President would exercise this power as to him seemed wisest and best; but he would exercise his power; he could not possibly avoid it; he could not resist the pressure. We know that, and we might as well acknowledge it. It seems to me that at this late hour, at this late day in this session, the Senate ought not to take up and consider a widespread and very important measure like that.

I will suggest also to the Senator that if the committee did not agree to any more amendments than those which he has stated, there are certain other amendments that should be put into the bill if it is to be taken up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think the criticism of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] that the purpose of the bill is to pad the judiciary is at all just. This measure went to a subcommittee composed of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and myself. The bill was perfected by the unanimous action of the subcommittee, the Senator from New York taking as active an interest in it as any of the other members of the subcommittee, and really favoring, perhaps, stronger language.

The bill does not say that the President shall appoint; it says that he may appoint. It goes one step further, according to the amendments upon which we have agreed, and which I shall submit from the Judiciary Committee, and which have been adopted by the Judiciary Committee in the House. It only allows the President to make the appointments when in his opinion the public service so requires.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will allow me, does he say that has been adopted in the House?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Judiciary Committee of the House has reported the bill out from that committee with that amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but I understood the Senator to say——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Judiciary Committee of the House has made a unanimous report on the bill, and we have considered it with three amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood the Senator to say it had been adopted in the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Judiciary Committee of the House has reported the bill with three amendments, and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has adopted those amendments, and I shall suggest two other verbal amendments, inserting words which were omitted in our print. The word "court" was omitted in one place and the word "hereinafter" was omitted in another place.

Now, the other House amendment which we recommend is in connection with the proviso, so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That in the case of the death or resignation thereafter of any circuit or district judge so entitled to resign in a circuit or district in which an additional judge has been appointed as herein provided, the vacancy caused thereby shall not be filled, but the number of the judges of such court shall be reduced accordingly.

The words "in a circuit or district in which an additional judge has been appointed as herein provided" constitute the amendment. The provision already meant what it will mean with the amendment, but the amendment makes it clearer.

Mr. President, it is not intended that in every place an appointment shall be made. We first used the word "shall," but we struck out the word "shall" and inserted the word "may," and then we accepted the provision reported by the House committee limiting appointments to those cases where the President believes that the public good requires them.

Now, let me present the situation to the Senate. To-day the law permits any judge of a district court who has reached 70 years of age and who has served 10 years to retire on full pay. There are two classes of judges who will be affected by the bill, one a class who ought to retire, who have become entirely inefficient and have quit work, but who for some reason do not retire. I illustrate that by a judge in the fifth circuit, a judge from Texas, who is 82 years old, who has not been on the bench in years, who remains at home and never has any hope of again being on the bench. This is a case in which the public good requires that a judge should be appointed, so that the circuit court of appeals in that circuit may have its five judges.

That is a case where a judge ought to retire but will not retire, and where it is absolutely essential to the public service that an additional judge be appointed. A special bill has been reported in both Houses to add an additional judge in that circuit to do the work of the circuit on account of the failure of a man 82 years old, who has not been on the bench for several years and can not go on it any more, to resign or retire. As I have said, that is a case of a judge who, although entirely inefficient, will not resign.

There is another class of judges whose situation will be met by this bill. They are judges who have passed the age of 70, who are able to do good work, who are able perhaps to do good work half the time, but who feel their physical inability to stand the full work of their circuits or their districts. I know several instances of judges of this character who will certainly resign this winter, but they would be glad during the balance of their lives, to the extent of their ability, not simply to draw salaries as retired judges but to render service in return.

Now, what benefit will the Government receive by preventing men of that class from retiring when they feel that they can not do the full work of their circuits or districts? It will be this: Instead of their retiring and with the loss of the benefit of several months every year of efficient work from these men, they will remain judges of the circuit court or judges of the district court, and where a district or circuit is crowded or a judge is sick and relief is needed, these district or circuit court judges, according to this bill, past 70 years of age, capable of good work part of the year, can go to a crowded district or circuit and relieve the situation by a few months' valuable work.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. What would be in the way when such an occasion presented itself of our then dealing with it, so that the judge could remain, an additional judge being appointed for the district or circuit, as the case might be? It seems to me that each case could easily be dealt with as it arose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the matter can be dealt with better in a general bill. I think, as a general proposition, it is wise to do so. We have had a number of instances of the kind referred to this year, and there are, I know, a number of other judges who are past 70 and who do not wish to quit work entirely. I know of one in Pennsylvania. This bill was brought to my attention in part by the suggestion of one of the circuit judges of Pennsylvania, and in part by a circuit court judge 78 years old in the fifth circuit. The judges who have passed 70 do not wish to resign——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think we have had three cases this winter of additional judges being appointed. There has been no difficulty at all in making provision as the cases have arisen. The Senator had no difficulty, in the very midst of an acute situation here, in getting a bill through affecting his section. There never is any trouble about that; and when such a contingency arises provision can be made for an extra judge taking the place of the old judge, who can still remain subject to assignment. I think it would be infinitely better to deal with these cases as they come up rather than to enact a wholesale proposition of this kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We believe the general policy should be that where a judge has passed 70 and the good of the service requires it the opportunity should be given the President, without special legislation, to appoint a judge. We have had the resignation during the present session of a district judge in the southern district of California who would not have resigned if this bill had been in force. He is capable of doing good work each year, but he has passed 70 and could retire. He did not wish to do the entire work of his district, but I am sure he would have been pleased had a general bill of this sort been in force, to have remained on the district court bench and to have been subject to assignment, and he could have done good work each year. Yet, as there was no such law, he was entitled to retire, and he simply retired. There are two classes of these judges. The only bills that we have passed are in cases where the judge has become entirely inefficient and does not do his work. You find that the man who is capable of doing at least half his work will not bring the subject to the attention of Congress and ask for a special bill to appoint somebody in his place. He will simply retire and go at something else.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he has data from which he could give the number of judges who would be appointed at this time under this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not give the data of those who would be appointed, because there is a limitation in the bill requiring the President in each case to find that the public service requires it. There are, I think, 14 or 16 who have passed 70 years of age.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he seriously believes and argues to the Senate that the power and authority being given to the President to appoint these judges he would not appoint them? Would not the same argument appeal to the President that appeals to the Senator in asking that the bill be passed? Would not the same argument appeal to the President to make the appointment?

The Senator has a faith that is sublime if he believes that these appointments being in the power and the gift of the President they would not be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If a judge was 70 and was thoroughly capable of doing all the work of his district, I would say there would be no appointment made, and should be no appointment made. If the judge was past 70 and did not feel able to do the work of his district, but was able to do a number of months' work each year, but not the full work of his district, then I think the President would make an appointment.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. Does the Senator believe that this measure is more important than the appropriation bills which we must consider?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think that; but I think we could take up this bill, and we ought to be able to dispose of it, one way or the other, in a very short time.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I desire to say that it will not be settled in a short time. It opens up a field of debate that may last for days. For one, I do not propose to sit here and permit, if I can prevent it, a revision of the laws that will enable the President to retire judges at 70 years of age when he wants to and load up the pay rolls of the United States with 10 or 15 additional judges.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I must reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas that it would load up the pay rolls with additional expense. It would do nothing of the kind. The law permits the judges to retire and receive their pay when they are past 70.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but this bill does that very thing, because the man still remains in the service. If this bill were not passed there would be no other judge appointed if he remained in the service; but if this bill is passed you put $6,000 into every district when he is appointed and $7,000 into every circuit.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, one word, if the Senator will permit me. I see that we have before us for consideration, first, the Agricultural bill. The Senator knows what an important bill that is, and knows that it may take a considerable time to pass it through the Senate. We have the diplomatic and consular bill, the fortifications bill, the general deficiency bill, the Military Academy bill, the urgent deficiency bill. Those measures are likely to take a good deal of time. Then there is one measure in particular that I wish to call to the attention of the Senator, and that is the Indian appropriation bill. I shall not be surprised if that bill takes three or four days; and it seems to me that instead of compelling us to sit up nights and exhaust ourselves, as we are bound to do if we try to pass these appropriation bills with due deliberation, we ought to take up these first, and then, if we have the time, take up the measure to which the Senator from Georgia refers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to address myself, not to the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, because of course I realize the importance of taking up the appropriation bills, but rather to the merits of the bill as criticized by the Senator from Wyoming.

I repeat that I regard this bill as a most desirable provision in the direction of economy, in the direction of relieving crowded districts, in the direction of relieving circuits in which there are judges who for some reason can not preside. It will furnish a number of judges on the circuit court bench, several not assigned to particular circuits who can still do a number of months of good work. It will furnish a number of district court judges who are not in a position to do full work who can do a considerable amount of admirable work. Take my own circuit, to illustrate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield for the present. The Senator can not take me off the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator is on the floor by my courtesy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I am not. I am on the floor by right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; the Senator is there by my consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to conclude my remarks. I regret that the Senator from Alabama interrupted me.

I am glad that I have been able, by privately speaking to the Senator from Alabama, to satisfy him. I do not intend to take much more time with this measure now, but as it has been criticized I wish the reasons for it and the value of it to be fully stated.

The effect will be that circuit court judges past 70, several of them, can relieve the other circuits without charge to the Government. The effect will be that district court judges past 70 can relieve the other districts without any cost to the country. Let me illustrate, and then I am through.

In my own circuit one of the circuit judges we concede is out of commission, so far as service is concerned; and we must add a man in his place, because he is off the bench, 82 years old, and useless. He will never sit on the bench again. There we have the absolute necessity for another judge. Another circuit judge is 78 years old. He will probably soon retire, and a judge will be appointed in his place to fill the vacancy, but if this bill is passed, he will continue to render able service part of the time. I know two district court judges in our circuit past 70 who will probably retire this winter, and who were on the point of retiring on the 1st of December, except that they hoped, by the passage of the bill in this form, they might still give, for the pay received, service a portion of the time to the Government.

So far as my immediate circuit is concerned, there is absolutely no interest in it except to retain the value of the services of these men who can at least do service half of the time for the Government. It is not padding. The vacancies will take place. They will draw their salaries just the same as retired judges, and the effect of the passage of the bill would be, at least in many cases, to give the Government, for the pay received, valuable service a portion of the time. But, Mr. President, I concede that the appropriation bills should be disposed of; and as the Senators on the other side announce that they intend to take quite a length of time in discussing this measure, the Senator from Kansas suggesting two or three days, I desire to withdraw my motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill at the present time.

COMMISSION ON DISTRICT HALF-AND-HALF PRINCIPLE.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that motion for one moment? If there is the least objection to what I am going to request, it will be immediately withdrawn.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee of conference on the District of Columbia appropriation bill are having trouble concerning the so-called half-and-half principle which we discussed here. There is no probability that we will reach an agreement unless a commission is provided. The Senate committee has reported a bill, introduced by the Senator from South Dakota, providing for a commission; and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered, with the understanding that if there is any debate it will be immediately withdrawn.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I would hardly like to have that matter taken up to-night, when there are some Senators absent who are very much interested in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That settles it, Mr. President.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I renew my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for committee amendments, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for committee amendments, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the Postmaster General," on page 2, line 6, after the word "each," to strike out "(an increase of two submitted in lieu of two assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each; to be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant)," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of post-office inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $3,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 20 inspectors, at $2,250 each; 32 inspectors, at $2,100 each; 20 inspectors, at $2,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $1,900 each; 90 inspectors, at $1,800 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,700 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,600 each; and 65 inspectors, at $1,500 each; in all, $783,700.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I think I shall take just a few minutes of the time of the Senate, and I can just as well take it now as at any other time.

I was glad to see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] move a moment ago to take up another bill. I do not know anything about that measure except what was given to us here on the floor, but it indicated that our friends hope not only to pass the appropriation bills, but to pass some other legislation that they consider pressing. There are some bills on the calendar that I think ought to be passed, that I think could be passed just as well as not, before the session closes, and I want to make a plea to the Senate for a part of the administration program, for one of the administration bills.

While I recognize the importance of passing the appropriation bills, I feel satisfied that these bills will be passed; but there is a bill on the calendar which should be enacted into law before the session closes, and there is no excuse for this not being done. I refer to what is known as the Shields-Adamson waterpower bill. It relates to the development of water powers on navigable streams. It has passed the House, and the Shields bill has been reported here as a substitute. Practically every section of the country is interested in this measure, and will be benefited to a greater or less extent by its passage. The Shields substitute has the unanimous, or almost unanimous, recommendation, I understand, of the Commerce Committee. It is one of the measures urged by the President. Why is it not called up? Why not get it to conference, so that an agreement may be reached and legislation had?

It is certain that if this measure is to be made a law it should be passed by the Senate without delay so as to get the matter in conference, so that any disagreement between the Senate and the House may be arranged.

Why not give some time to it, instead of wasting the time of the Senate in attempting to pass legislation which every one knows can not be passed? It is one of the plain evidences of the incapacity of the present governmental leadership that it will waste its time and energy in trying to pass what it ought to know and what its experience has shown can not be passed and thereby prevent the consideration of measures of vast importance and which might be passed with but very little trouble or delay.

Water power is one of our country's greatest natural resources. Properly developed it will become a national achievement and a national blessing. Undeveloped, it continues to be a national reproach. We all agree that under present conditions our water powers must be developed by private capital. Capital can not be secured for development purposes under the restrictive laws now in force. It is, therefore, the duty of Congress to enact wise legislation which, while fully protecting the public interest will present a business proposition that will pass muster in the councils of honorable business men. No benefit will accrue from changing our present water-power laws, under which capital can not be obtained and under which water-power development has become practically stagnant, if new legislation shall merely continue this old policy. It is obvious that unless our new laws make it possible to secure capital, we shall have wasted our time and in the end have no water-power development.

A diligent study of the bill reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce and conferences which I have had concerning it with practical people who merit every confidence and who have developed and who are operating water powers, has convinced me that the bill is sound in principle and businesslike in terms; that it fully protects the public interest and consumers and fairly treats both Federal and State rights. Under its terms capital may be obtained and its enactment would result in the development of the great water powers now wasting their energies in our navigable streams throughout the entire extent of the United States.

I believe that the development of our water powers constitutes by far the greatest and most urgent commercial problem now before Congress and our wise solution of that problem will be regarded as one of the greatest if not the greatest achievement of this Congress, if we can just get the Senate to take action promptly on this legislation and enact it into law. Let me give you two object lessons of what the passage of this bill in its present form would mean to the State of Washington alone.

Congress has granted a permit for the construction of a dam across the Pend Oreille River for water-power development. Several thousand dollars have been expended in getting ready. The project will cost about $10,000,000 and develop about 200,000 horsepower, which will be largely used in the manufacture of fertilizer and the development of other manufacturing establishments. The work would have been actively under way except that the blighting hand of departmental power has prevented. Some public and forest-reserve lands would have been overflowed by the construction of the dam, and this placed it within the power of the Interior and Agricultural Departments to prevent the work. They granted what they thought was a reasonable permit for the use of this public land. The permit, however, was revocable and this deters capital from investing in the enterprise, and the money has not been secured to put it in. I am assured that there is capital that intends to go into the manufacture of fertilizer in this country or in Canada. Liberal inducements have been offered by Canada, but these people prefer to invest in this country. They would take up this work on the Pend Oreille if this Shields-Adamson bill is passed now. If it is not passed they will this summer go to Canada. We will lose the money and the enterprise, and the product will come in from Canada to retard further development in this country. The investment of $10,000,000 in one enterprise, with the resultant benefits, would alone justify special action by Congress on this legislation, but this is not all.

Come with me into the central portion of my State and let me spread before you a mighty collection of idle resources and unutilized opportunities. This idleness and this lack of utilization are the sole result of congressional inaction. Could you come with me there, there would be no need for me to urge in this Chamber your favorable action on this measure. I would show you a compact block of country more than 400,000 acres in extent—a country made up of the richest of volcanic ash, protected from the cold winds of the north by a barrier of mountains, and nourished by almost perpetual sunshine of nearly semitropical degree. Looking across you would see hardly a habitation, and for miles in every direction your view of sagebrush desert would be practically unbroken. In the midst of that region, however, you would see the Columbia, twelfth largest river in the world, second in the United States, carrying a greater annual volume of water than the Mississippi at Cairo, and a far greater low-water flow. You would see this great stream racing down over Priest Rapids, a 90-foot fall in 9 miles. You would see laid across this country the rails of a transcontinental road, and only a short distance to the south the rails of another transcontinental road, but you would not see the trains stopping here to pick up the products which this area could produce nor to bring into this area the merchandise that it could consume.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRYAN. From what committee does this bill come?

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRYAN. Was there any opposition to it there?

Mr. JONES. I understand that it was practically a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator know whether there will be any discussion of it here?

Mr. JONES. I do not know, but I hope not.

Mr. BRYAN. Suppose the Senator should try it out and see whether it will pass.

Mr. JONES. I would be delighted to have that course pursued.

Mr. BRYAN. Then why not go on with the appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES. If the Senate will pass this bill, I will stop, but I want to present some facts here showing the object of passing this legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator would not insist on doing that if we passed the bill?

Mr. JONES. Certainly not. I am not talking against the passage of the bill. I hope I will not be accused of filibustering when I am urging the passage of an administration measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say that I agree entirely with the Senator from Washington in the statement he has made with reference to the great importance of this measure. I think it is one of the measures, outside of the appropriation bills, which ought to be passed at this session. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce that considered this bill and considered it very thoroughly, and, as I recall, there was not in the committee the slightest opposition to the bill in the shape it was finally reported. The entire committee, composed of Democrats and Republicans alike, favored the bill, and I think if we could get an agreement to vote upon it in an hour or something like that it would be very well to do it. The Senator might give us some indication as to whether there would be any discussion of the bill on his side of the Chamber. I know of no purpose on this side of the Chamber to engage in a discussion of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, who rose first.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to state that I agree with the Senator from Washington relative to this bill, with one exception, an amendment which I think would be accepted by everyone here, and that is to make these water-power plants subject to taxation for State, county, and school purposes. I think with that done I would have no objection whatever to the Shields bill. I am as much in favor of the bill as I am opposed to the other water-power bill that is proposed to lease the water powers of the States and not have them subject to taxation for State, county, and school purposes. However, I want to suggest to the Senator from Washington that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who reported the bill, is not here now. I think he can get the bill up at any time and in a few minutes pass it with that slight amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely desire to say that I do not share the view of my colleagues about me here who a moment ago expressed the opinion that the bill referred to by the Senator from Washington could be passed after a very brief discussion. In my opinion it will require a day or two and probably more than that amount of time to pass the bill. I know a number of Senators who have expressed the desire and the intention to discuss the bill. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that it is impracticable at this time to consider the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Washington permit me one moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I think this bill is one of the most important measures before the Senate, and I sincerely hope Senators will permit it some time or other before adjournment to come up for consideration. I would be glad to help the Senator on this side and on the other side of the Chamber as far as I can to get consideration for this measure. I think it is wanted from Maine to Oregon and Washington and California, as far as I can find out.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Pennsylvania, however, would not want to have it called up in the absence of the Senator who reported the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I did not know anything about that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no purpose to call up the bill now. I wish to ask about how long it will take the Senator from Washington to conclude?

Mr. JONES. I think about 10 minutes. I will go a little fast.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am anxious to proceed with the appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. I have a sincere purpose in this matter and I am glad to see the interest manifested in it by different Senators in this Chamber. As the Senator from Pennsylvania said it is a bill in which the people from Maine to California and from Michigan to Florida and the Southland, and all over the country, are interested. There is probably not a State in the Union that would not receive some benefit from the passage of this legislation, and we ought to be able to pass it with very little discussion. I am simply calling attention to some of the conditions in my State that probably will be duplicated to a greater or less extent in many of the other States in the Union showing the very great importance of this measure. I feel satisfied there will not be very much discussion upon the bill on this side of the Chamber, and I certainly hope that Senators on the other side of the Chamber will try to avoid discussion as much as possible in order to place on the statute books at this session at least one measure of the administration program.

The Columbia is a navigable river and Priest Rapids, 400 miles from the Pacific Ocean, lies in the heart of this naturally favored region and presents a barrier to up-river navigation. The completion within the present year of the Celilo Locks, 200 miles farther down the river, will bring to the foot of these rapids a deep, navigable channel from the Pacific Ocean. With Priest Rapids surmounted by locks and a dam, the navigable channel would penetrate 180 miles farther into the State, or, to within 250 miles of the Canadian border. This surmounting of Priest Rapids would cost the United States Treasury an enormous sum, but under the terms of this bill the Government expense of that accomplishment would be nominal, while the benefits to navigation would be vast.

Let me show you a picture, the best that I can portray but relatively poor and inadequate, of that which would follow the adoption of this measure. An enterprise would be started that would result in an ultimate initial expenditure of $10,000,000.

I am assured to-day by a very reliable gentleman from Maine that if this measure will pass financial arrangements have been practically completed by which this work could be undertaken, but if this legislation does not pass those very people will go into Canada and establish a similar enterprise there, for which very liberal inducements have been offered to them. It seems to me under such conditions as that Congress really neglects its duty by a failure to act.

A dam across the foot of Priest Rapids 90 feet high would be constructed. This would lift the water so that it would flow by gravity over 200,000 acres of this rich land and the utilization of a part of the water power developed would lift more water to an additional 135,000 acres of richer land. The Columbia River carries water enough at the low season to irrigate practically every acre along its course susceptible of cultivation, but, as though nature had by intent selected this region for the bestowal of especial bounties, the flood flow of the Columbia comes during the irrigation season. This flood flow consists largely of the late melted snows of the Canadian Rockies. So at the time of the greatest demand for irrigation there is in this mighty stream ample water for navigation and for the development of water power. I now emphasize water power, for Priest Rapids developed for navigation and for irrigation purposes must, by very consequence, become the Niagara of the West.

The commercial water power at Priest Rapids amounts to about 400,000 horsepower. Reflect upon the meaning of this opportunity when developed in the midst of this agricultural region. We of the State of Washington have by our public-utility laws amply provided for the proper control and use of this power resource, and we now want to bring to Priest Rapids the great new manufacturing industries which have, by the use of electric power, changed the course of industry and so enlivened those parts of the civilized world in which water-power resources exist. This enlivenment has taken place, however, only where governments have encouraged water-power development instead of discouraging it, as we have done in the United States. We want to bring to Priest Rapids the great nitrogen factories which will give to the West a source of cheap agricultural fertilizer and to the whole country a self-sustaining basis as to nitrogen in our national defense. Senators, in the midst of a war almost world-wide, we can not avoid the uneasy reflection, however peaceful our intent and purpose may be, that if we were stricken with the misfortune that now besets Europe we would be dependent upon foreign nations for the principal element in warfare—nitrogen. Without it all of our other possessions and accomplishments would be useless.

We of Washington want to bring to Priest Rapids the electric furnace for the smelting of ores which are making over the metal industries of the world, but in which industrial improvements we are lagging far behind our world competitors. We want to electrify our railroads and therefore cheapen the cost of their operation and obviate what is now our greatest and most needless waste of our exhaustible coal resources.

We want to make available for irrigation the tremendous waters now running unused to the sea and make productive the thousands of acres of fertile land now idle and unpopulated. This land will produce in abundance every product of the Temperate Zone—every 40 acres will support a home in comfort and plenty, and ultimately there will be a happy home on every 10 acres—and where now is waste and silence will be thousands of people, prosperous towns, villages, and cities with railways, electric lights, and all the modern accompaniments of civilization.

In this region now lying in desert silence villages and towns will spring up which will furnish homes for employees, which will develop schools and churches, and all will be set in the midst of and be supported by this agricultural development. It is not an exaggeration to predict that within five years after the passage of this bill at least $100,000,000 would be invested in this region. Down the Columbia to the sea and along the railroad line will go the agricultural and manufactured products. All this we of the State of Washington wish to bring into this now unproductive section; but it should be realized and emphasized that if it be accomplished, the opportunities and facilities there must be placed in competition with the opportunities and facilities offered by other industrial countries. It will be necessary for Congress to determine whether this country shall have a fair chance in industrial competition, or whether it must sustain a handicap of unfair and unbusinesslike governmental restrictions.

If the Federal or State Governments are not to develop our water powers, then it is imperatively necessary that laws under which capital will be invested should be enacted. Congress, on behalf of the people, can afford to be generous toward capital in this matter, and they can not afford not to be generous. I plead against the narrow, restrictive, unbusinesslike policy which would prevent these developments. There is no sense in our enacting laws which will not be taken advantage of, but which will be relegated to the dust shelves where other restrictive measures now repose. This bill as now framed will induce and permit development; it preserves to the States the rights given them under the Constitution, and the people will fully protect the consumers under local laws and regulations. We are anxious to extend our foreign trade by the expenditure of millions. Why not enact legislation that will encourage the use of our own resources and develop our own industries without the cost of a single dollar to the people and the Government?

Mr. President, I certainly hope that in the next few days Senators will give this matter careful consideration and try some way to get it sent to the House and put it in conference and bring it out here and pass legislation which will really be constructive legislation and bring tremendous development to the country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will not take 30 seconds in what I want to say. It is simply this, that the bill the Senator referred to is Order of Business No. 740, House bill 16053. I am thoroughly in accord with what the Senator from Washington has said, and I wish to assure him and other Senators who favor it that I will cooperate with them to get early action upon this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be agreed to, without objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General," on page 5, line 8, after the word "postmasters," to strike out "$30,750,000" and insert "$31,255,720," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to postmasters, $31,255,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 9, to insert:

Provided, That hereafter the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof to the First Assistant Postmaster General, for the calendar year immediately preceding the adjustment.

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, 5, at not exceeding $4,600 each; 45, at not exceeding $3,000 each; 10, at not exceeding $2,500 each; 5, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 20, at not exceeding $1,900 each; 50, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 95, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 150, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 180, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 180, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 400, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 575, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 525, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 300, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 130, at not exceeding $900 each; 100, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $3,350,000. The next amendment was, on page 14, line 10, after the words "without pay," to strike out "And to provide for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade; in all, $48,860,000" and insert "$46,100,000: Provided, That on and after July 1, 1915, clerks at first-class post offices shall be promoted successively to the sixth grade and clerks at second-class post offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade. All promotions of clerks shall be made at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of two years' service in the next lower grade, and no promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Post Office Department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding two years," so as to read:

Substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay, $46,100,000: Provided, That on and after July 1, 1915, clerks at first-class post offices shall be promoted successively to the sixth grade and clerks at second-class post offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade. All promotions of clerks shall be made at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of two years' service in the next lower grade, and no promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Post Office Department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding two years; and hereafter the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during each fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than the sum appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out and insert so as to restore the old law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all from and including line 6, on page 14, down to and including the word "years," on line 20, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And to provide for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade; in all, $48,860,000.

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to me the better way would be to disagree to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand this matter.

Mr. BRYAN. It would simply amount to a disagreement to the committee amendment, or, in other words, restore the House provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote whereby the amendment to strike out the House text was agreed to is reconsidered, and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a matter as to which I do not know whether or not I am correct, but I have a memorandum that the amount on page 14, line 10, of "$48,860,000" should be "$47,200,000."

Mr. BRYAN. I understand the department estimated for $48,860,000.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer that as an amendment. If I am not mistaken, I think, if the chairman will examine it, he will see that that figure is proper. I am satisfied to call the matter to the attention of the chairman, however, and let it go over. He can then look into it later in the evening or to-morrow.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, $47,200,000 is the correct amount.

Mr. PENROSE. Then that is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 10, in the total appropriation it is proposed to strike out "$48,860,000," and to insert "$47,200,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to say that in respect to biennial promotions I have prepared and submitted to the committee an amendment which preserves the old law, as suggested by the committee itself, I having received many petitions from many employees of the Post Office Department, requesting that the former custom of annual promotions be retained, and that the suggestion of biennial promotions be opposed. I take the liberty at this time to ask, so that I may not occupy any time, to tender a resolution of the city council of Chicago and ask to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The old law with reference to that matter has been restored.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand that, and I am only asking that this paper which I present may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Whereas the postmaster of the city of Chicago, in pursuance of directions from the Postmaster General regarding expenditures at the Chicago post office, has undertaken and proposes to reduce the wages of approximately 350 letter carriers from positions which they now occupy, so that a number of carriers will become collectors and certain of the collectors will become substitute letter carriers, and their wages will be cut from $1,200 per annum to $1,000 per annum, and the $1,200 grade will be reserved only as a reward for specially meritorious service, which under the schedules adopted can only be performed by young men; and

Whereas the method in which this is being done makes it incumbent upon men who have been in the service for many years to waive their present grade under the civil service and to consent to work under conditions which will make it necessary to be promoted through the medium of efficiency markings in the future, thereby cutting themselves off from the possibility of again acquiring their present rank by reason of the fact that they are no longer able to maintain averages as high as younger men in the service; and

Whereas the gross receipts of the Chicago post office for the year 1914 were about $26,000,000, while the total expenditures, including all salaries, wagon contracts, and other incidentals, amounted to about $9,000,000, leaving a surplus of approximately $17,000,000, which the Chicago post office turned in to the treasury of the Post Office Department at Washington for the year 1914; and

Whereas the letter carriers of the city of Chicago have already been overburdened by reason of changes which have reduced the number of deliveries in most parts of the city, so that the service which the people in these districts have a right to demand is impaired, the prompt delivery of mail is no longer possible, and the strength of the carriers is overtaxed by being compelled to include more mail in one delivery than is proper and reasonable or conducive to good service; and

Whereas the reduction of salaries above mentioned and the onerous conditions imposed on men long in the service will take away the incentive for rendering the excellent service these men have always given and tend to lower the morale and efficiency of the force to the detriment of the people of Chicago: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the city council of the city of Chicago should protest, and hereby does protest, against the reduction of the salaries of the 350 postal employees who are included within the order reducing the wages of letter carriers from $1,200 to $1,000 per year, believing that such reduction and the manner in which it is being put into effect will tend to lower the standard of efficiency in the force of employees of the Chicago post office, and will tend to deprive the people of Chicago of the high-class service which they are paying for and have a right to demand;

Be it further resolved, That it is the sense of this council that it is unjust and contrary to public policy to place men who have rendered efficient service for many years, some of whom have grown old while working for the Government, into a position where they will be unable to again meet the requirements for efficiency that will replace them where they will be entitled to their former salary, and that the city authorities feel bound to take notice of the results which must arise from such a course, in order that the right of the people of Chicago to the best possible postal service may be asserted;

Be it further resolved, That if it is necessary to reduce the wages of employees in order to meet the conditions arising from the falling off of postal receipts this should be done in places where the receipts fall below the expenditures, or at any rate in places where there is not so large a surplus in the earnings of the department as in the city of Chicago; and

Be it further resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded by the city clerk to the President of the United States, the Postmaster General, the postmaster of Chicago, the two Senators from Illinois, and the Members of the House of Representatives whose districts are wholly or partly within the city of Chicago, to the end that prompt action may be taken against carrying out the proposed unjust policy.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
County of Cook, ss:

I, Francis D. Connery, city clerk of the city of Chicago, do hereby certify that the annexed and foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution relative to postal employees adopted by the city council of the city of Chicago on the 15th day of February, A. D. 1915, original of which resolution is on file in my office, and that I am the lawful custodian of the same.

Witness my hand and the corporate seal of said city of Chicago this 17th day of February, A. D. 1915.

FRANCIS D. CONNERY, City Clerk.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I wish to join the Senator from Illinois in expressing my gratification that the committee has eliminated the feature of biennial promotions. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a communication, for the enlightenment of future Congresses, reciting the inconveniences and evils of the biennial promotion proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The communication referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1915.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Post Office appropriation bill, reported to the Senate February 8, contains three amendments which permanently change existing law by substituting biennial promotions for annual promotions for post-office clerks, city letter carriers, and railway mail clerks.

The first of these amendments, which affects clerks in first and second class post offices, occurs on page 14, lines 10 to 20, and its purpose is to permanently amend the classification act of 1907 so as to compel two years of service in each grade before promotion to the next higher grade instead of one year, as is now provided.

Under existing law clerks in first-class post offices can be promoted $100 per annum until the maximum grade of $1,200 is reached, and clerks in second-class offices can be promoted $100 per annum until the maximum grade of $1,100 is reached. The existing law provides that no promotion can be made except upon satisfactory evidence to the department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the clerk during the preceding year.

Before receiving regular appointment these clerks must serve as substitutes for an average period of two years or more, during which time they are held on call and receive no fixed compensation. Therefore under existing law it requires a period of from six to seven years' service for a clerk to reach the maximum grade of $1,200 per annum in first-class offices.

Under the pending amendment, on page 14 of the bill, it would require 12 years or more to reach the same maximum grade.

The particular employees who will be affected by these pending amendments are the lowest-paid servants in the Postal Service, and consequently they are the least able to bear the burden of what practically amounts to a serious reduction in their compensation.

These post-office clerks are for the most part employed at night.

In addition to their regular hours of duty in the post office, the great majority of them are compelled to devote hours of study outside of the post office in order that they may learn the difficult and constantly changing "schemes" of mail distribution. They must regularly submit themselves to examinations to insure the maintenance of a high degree of efficiency.

We submit that if the pending amendments herein referred to should be adopted, the efficiency of the service will suffer, because the position of post-office clerk will no longer be sufficiently attractive to induce the right kind of young men to enter the service.

Your attention is respectfully directed to the fact that the three amendments herein referred to constitute practically the only new legislation recommended by the Senate Post Office Committee.

The United National Association of Post Office Clerks, representing more than 26,000 clerks employed in the first and second class post offices of the country, earnestly petition you to oppose the pending amendments.

Respectfully, yours, FRANK T. ROGERS, President.

Mr. LEWIS. Might I ask the chairman of the committee, does this change apply to all parts of the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. The chairman of the committee having stated that it applies to all parts of the bill renders it unnecessary that I occupy the floor of the Senate any further.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, both the Senator from Illinois and I had lengthy speeches which we intended to deliver on this subject, and I regret that by reason of the action of the committee we are personally deprived of the privilege of addressing the Senate on this subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I decline to be entirely ignored on this subject, and I join in the expressions which have been made by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will state that I had introduced an amendment, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to correct this matter. I, too, want to join the noble band, consisting of my colleague [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] on this proposition.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 14, line 23, after the word "appropriated," to strike out:

Provided, That on and after July 1, 1915, the compensation to employees other than those in the clerical grades in post offices of the

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. That is connected with the amendment which has been heretofore agreed to, and in view of that fact this amendment should be disagreed to. We should restore the House language and leave out the amendment proposed by the committee appearing in italics.

Mr. PENROSE. What part of the bill is the Senator from Florida proposing to amend?

Mr. BRYAN. On page 21.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senate has been making such unseemly haste all day that I have had difficulty in keeping up with the proceedings.

Mr. BRYAN. There were three classes of employees involved in biennial or annual promotions. The Senate has restored the House provision in so far as the postal clerks are concerned. The letter carriers are likewise situated, as are the postal clerks. On page 21 the letter carriers are dealt with, and disagreement with the amendment would restore the House provision as to letter carriers, which allows annual promotions instead of making them biennial.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the provision for the biennial promotion of letter carriers is stricken out of the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. That increases the amount $1,700,000.

Mr. PENROSE. I again express my gratification that the committee has taken that action. I had some remarks to make on the measure, but, of course, it is not necessary to address the Senate on it, and I shall restrain myself and ask the Reporter to insert in the RECORD the communication which I send to the desk, from the National Association of Letter Carriers.

Mr. BRYAN. It is costing about a million and a half dollars every time the Senator from Pennsylvania restrains himself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The communication referred to is as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1915.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE, City.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I submit herewith for your consideration a statement showing the effect that the amendment proposed in the Post Office appropriation bill, on page 21, lines 17 to 24, and page 22, lines 1 and 2, will have on the classification act, which provides the manner and method for promotions of letter carriers in the City Delivery Service. Under the law as it now stands a letter carrier works on an average of eight years before he can possibly reach the maximum grade in a first-class post office or the $1,100 grade in a second-class office, and during that period of time his average daily compensation is $2.05.

A letter carrier is only paid for the actual time that he is employed, so that in case of sickness or other causes a letter carrier is off duty, his average earnings fall below the above amount. A postal employee can not be promoted to any of the intermediate grades unless he renders satisfactory service for one year in each of the lower grades, so that his promotion depends entirely on his rendering efficient service. I trust that you will read the statement submitted herewith, and that you can see the depressing effect that the proposed amendment will have on the letter carriers of the country if it is enacted into law.

I hope that the justice of retaining the classification act in its present form will meet with your approval and that you can see your way clear to record your opposition to the amendment proposed, and that you will not think it presumptuous of me for drawing your attention to this matter.

Sincerely, yours, ED. J. CANTWELL, Secretary.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT ON LETTER CARRIERS' CLASSIFICATION LAW.

The Post Office appropriation bill as reported to the Senate February 8, 1915, contains three amendments which, if enacted into law, will amend the classification acts of post-office clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and railway mail clerks, and provide that promotions in these services shall be made biennially instead of annually as at present. For the information of the Senate a statement is herewith submited of the operation of the law in its present form and also the effect that the proposed amendment would have if it is adopted.

In the City Delivery Service, when a man receives an appointment he is assigned for duty as a substitute. These substitutes serve on an average of three years before they receive an appointment to the regular force, and during this substitute period earn on an average of $25 per month. When appointed to a regular position the employee receives a salary of $800 per annum the first year, and if his services are satisfactory to the department and he is recommended for promotion by his postmaster he can receive annual promotions of $100 each year until he reaches the $1,100 grade in second-class offices and the $1,200 grade in first-class offices. Under the most favorable circumstances he must work eight years under the present law before he can reach the maximum grade of salary, and during that period of time he averages $61.46 per month, or $2.05 per day.

Under the proposed amendment a city letter carrier would work on an average of three years as a substitute at $25 per month, and if then appointed to the regular force he would have to serve two years in the $800 grade and two years in each of the intervening grades, or a total of 13 years before he could reach the $1,200 grade. His average earning capacity during the first 8 years under the proposed amendment would be $55.21 per month, or $1.84 per day. A comparison of 8 years of service under the present law and that of the amendment proposed in this bill is herewith submitted.

PRESENT LAW.

Average period served as a substitute is three years, with an average salary of $25 per month, or $300 per year.

3 years as substitute, at $300	$900.00
1 year as regular, at $800	800.00
1 year as regular, at $900	900.00
1 year as regular, at $1,000	1,000.00
1 year as regular, at $1,100	1,100.00
1 year as regular, at $1,200	1,200.00
Total 8 years' salary	5,900.00
Average yearly salary	737.50
Average monthly salary	61.46
Average daily salary	2.05

PROPOSED LAW.

3 years as substitute, at $300	$900.00
2 years as regular, at $800	1,600.00
2 years as regular, at $900	1,800.00
1 year as regular, as $1,000	1,000.00
Total 8 years' salary	5,300.00
Average yearly salary	662.50

The present law provides that "no promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Post Office Department of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding year. The Post Office Department may reduce a clerk or carrier from a higher to a lower grade whenever his efficiency falls below a fair standard or whenever necessary for purposes of discipline." According to the law as it now stands, an employee must earn his promotion by rendering service entirely satisfactory to the postmaster and the Post Office Department officials, and unless he does so he is denied promotion. Under the most favorable conditions and with a record of efficient service, an employee works on an average of eight years before he can possibly reach the $1,200 grade. If the amendment proposed by the Senate committee is adopted it will take an employee 13 years before he can reach the $1,200 grade.

The amendment referred to above is on page 21, lines 17 to 24, and page 22, lines 1 and 2. Post Office appropriation bill.

It is contended that under the laws that now exist that the promotions of employees are none too rapid considering the duties they perform, and it surely would not be an incentive to competent and efficient employees to continue in the service if they have to look forward to 13 years of service before they could reach the highest grade of $1,200 per annum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment is disagreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 22, line 5, after the word "established," to strike out "$3,500,000," and insert "$3,000,000"; so as to make the clause read:

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices where city delivery is already established, $3,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General," on page 24, line 2, after the words "mail bags," to strike out "$650,000," and insert "$625,000"; so as to make the clause read:

For pay of freight or expressage on postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail bags, $625,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$30,429,825" and insert "$29,664,000"; so as to make the clause read:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, at $3,250 each; 2 assistant superintendents, at $2,350 each; 15 assistant division superintendents, at $2,250 each; 121 chief clerks, at not exceeding $2,100 each; 466 clerks, grade 10, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 1,658 clerks, grade 9, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 601 clerks, grade 8, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 6,985 clerks, grade 7, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 2,041 clerks, grade 6, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 1,839 clerks, grade five, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 2,441 clerks, grade 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 2,672 clerks, grade 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 2,429 clerks, grade 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 2,213 clerks, grade one, at not to exceed $900 each; in all $29,664,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 13, after the word "exceeded," to insert:

Provided further, That from and after July 1, 1915, regular promotions of railway postal clerks now provided for by law shall be made, and promotions above these grades within the maximum grades of the classification may be made in the discretion of the Postmaster General for meritorious service, only at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of two years' service in the next lower grade.

Mr. BRYAN. Following the same action that has heretofore been taken, the proposed amendment from line 13 to line 25 should be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, may I say, in line with what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has said, that I am sorry that the Senate will be deprived of some very eloquent remarks from West Virginia on that subject, owing to the action which the Senator from Florida has just taken. I, too, desire to congratulate him.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment on page 25, line 4, striking out "$30,429,825" and inserting "$29,664,000" was agreed to, and that the amendment be disagreed to. The rejection of the amendments in regard to promotions costs money, and we will have to put back the amounts originally provided.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand, the rejection of the proviso beginning on line 13, page 25, eliminates the biennial promotion proposition so far as the railway postal clerks are concerned?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. In that connection, without making the speech which I intended to make on this question, I desire to insert in the RECORD a communication from the official representatives of this class of employees, explaining the reasons why the amendment proposed should not prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communication will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1915.

HON. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, City.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am sending with this a statement that will explain, on behalf of the men in the Railway Mail Service, the effect of the amendment contained in the Post Office bill as reported by the Senate committee. The amendment affecting this branch of the service reads as follows:

"Provided further, That from and after July 1, 1915, regular promotions of railway postal clerks now provided for by law shall be made, and promotions above these grades within the maximum grades of the classification may be made, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, for meritorious service only at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of two years' service in the next lower grade."

The effect of this amendment is to change the system of annual promotions established by the law of August 24, 1912, to a biennial system. The effect of this amendment will fall most heavily upon the men in the lower grades of this service and but lightly upon the men in the higher grades.

I would be pleased to have you give the inclosed statement such consideration as you may think the subject merits.

Very respectfully, GEO. H. FAIR.

A STATEMENT.

The Post Office bill as reported by the Senate committee contains three similar amendments. These affect the post-office clerks at certain offices, the carriers at free-delivery offices, and the Railway Mail Service. The amendment affecting the post-office clerks is found on page 14 of the bill, lines 10 to 20; that affecting the carriers is found on pages 21 to 22, beginning with line 17 on page 21; and that affecting the Railway Mail Service is found on page 25, lines 13 to 20.

The law providing for annual promotions in the Railway Mail Service was passed August 24, 1912—less than three years ago. By it the clerks in this service were placed upon the same promotion basis as the letter carriers and the post-office clerks. While it provided for successive promotions up to a certain limit, it was essentially a service-promition measure. Under the provisions of this law a clerk in a class A line might be promoted successively to the $1,100 grade, a clerk in a class B line to the $1,200 grade, and a clerk in a class C line to the $1,300 grade. In each case the clerk must earn his promotion by rendering a year's "satisfactory service" in the next lower grade. Promotions above these grades are "meritorious promotions," to be made in the discretion of the Postmaster General upon satisfactory evidence of "the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding year."

In the Railway Mail Service a prospective clerk enters the service as a substitute, without regular employment or any guaranteed compensation. He is given employment whenever his services are needed, because of the absence, from any cause, of the regular clerks. He may have steady employment for a season or he may work but a few days in a month. His period of service as a substitute under normal conditions has been, approximately, two years, but under existing conditions it will be a longer time. He is regularly appointed when he has reached the head of the substitute list. During his whole life as a substitute he is required to study his schemes of distribution unless he be assigned to a terminal railway post office.

When he is regularly appointed, it is as a clerk of grade 1, at a salary of $900. Under the present law he serves for one year in this grade, and, if his services have been satisfactory, he is promoted to $1,000. After a year's satisfactory service in this grade he is promoted to $1,100. This is his "successive promotion limit" on a class A line. If he be assigned to a class B line or a class C line, he may be promoted to $1,200; and if he be assigned to a class C line, he may be promoted to $1,300. Each of these promotions depends upon "satisfactory service," which includes study requirements, road work, and general qualifications.

Under the law of August 24, 1912, it requires approximately seven years to reach the limit of the successive promotions and nine years to reach the highest grade in the service below that of a clerk in charge. Under the proposed amendment it will require 10 years of service before a clerk reaches the highest grade of the successive promotions, the $1,300 grade, and 14 years before he can reach the highest grade in the service below that of a clerk in charge—that is, the $1,500 grade in a class C line. During all of this time he is exposed to the hazard incident to this branch of the service and is maintaining his examination requirements at the high standard fixed by the Post Office Department.

This proposed change does not affect to a very great extent the higher grade men of the service, but the burden of it falls upon the men of the lower grades.

Taking into consideration the hazard of his employment, the exhaustive physical effort required to work at high tension upon rapidly moving trains, and the exact knowledge required of him in the discharge of his duty, it would appear that his compensation was not out of proportion to the services rendered.

Respectfully submitted.

GEO. H. FAIR,
President Railway Mail Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On page 25, line 4, does the amount, "$30,429,825," remain in the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I have moved to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to striking out that amount and inserting "$29,654,000" and that the amendment be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask if the effect of the committee amendment being disagreed to revives the old law providing for annual promotions if deserved?

Mr. BRYAN. It makes promotions compulsory if the employees remain in the service.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 29, after line 12, to strike out:

The appropriation for two delegates to the International Postal Union at Madrid, to be appointed by the Postmaster General from the Post Office Department, made by the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, is hereby continued and shall be available for such convention when it shall be held.

And insert:

The appropriation for two delegates to the International Postal Union at Madrid, to be appointed by the Postmaster General from the Postal Service, made by the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, is hereby continued and shall be available for such convention when it shall be held.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General," on page 30, line 7, after the words "Rural Delivery Service," to strike out "$54,700,000," and insert "$52,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, $52,000,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SWANSON. That amendment goes over.

Mr. SMOOT. It goes over.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want any misunderstanding about it.

Mr. SWANSON. It is the amendment on page 30, line 7, under the heading "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General."

Mr. WEEKS. There are several Senators who want to discuss that matter.

Mr. SMOOT. That goes over with section 21 on page 56.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. BRYAN. What is the amendment which goes over?

Mr. SWANSON. It is in regard to the Rural Delivery Service on page 30.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no objection to that amendment being passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 30, line 21, after the words "third class," to strike out "$200,000," and insert "$150,000," so as to make the clause read:

For experimental village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, for myself only, I desire to move to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22, on page 30. I wish to state in a word that the provision incorporated in those lines will embark us upon an expenditure that in a few years will mount into the millions of dollars for village delivery service. This item is added on the theory that it is experimental; but before the House committee it was stated that the object they have in view and what this money will be spent for will be to make an experimental delivery service in each congressional district. When you establish such a service in one village in each congressional district, then every other town and every other village of the same size will be demanding it; and they will have justice behind the demand. They will demand it upon the ground of equality of treatment.

Now, I understand that the Senate is going to allow the provision to remain in the bill, but I want to register my protest against it here and now, and I make the prediction that if it does remain in the bill, in 10 years the service will cost the Government $20,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Why does he think the Senate will necessarily leave the provision in the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. They left it in last year. The experiment was initiated two years ago with an appropriation of $50,000. The Post Office Department was opposed to it then, and is opposed to it now. They want to save this $150,000. They tried to save by asking the men in the service to waive for this year the annual promotions, but it became so evident that Congress would not agree to that proposition that the committee met again and reconsidered their action, because of which the appropriation has been increased by the amendments agreed to in the last few minutes between two and a half and three million dollars.

When the first appropriation for this experimental service was made, the department, to show its disapproval of it, did not spend the money; they have never spent the amount of money that has been appropriated; and even this year they came before Congress and said, "We do not want this money"; and yet the House gave $200,000. The department said, however, "If you give it to us, the understanding is that we will put a delivery service in one village in each congressional district"; and it is not difficult to figure that in a very few years every other village in every congressional district will be insisting upon the same privilege, and the people who now can not be kept away from the village post office, who go there day by day to see the trains pass and to get their mail, will stay at home or will not go to the post office, or, if they do go, they will not get their mail there, but will have it delivered to them.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the rural carriers could deliver this mail without any additional expense at all, but that is not the plan. The plan is to build up a system that in a few years is going to cost 50 per cent of the amount the Rural Delivery Service costs to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will agree to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope so, too, and I hope at least the matter will go to conference.

Mr. SMOOT. If those lines are stricken out, it will go to conference. I agree with the Senator from Florida in relation to this item. I do not believe that we ought to embark on this undertaking.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is simply an appropriation to continue the present existing service. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars was spent for this purpose last year, and the amount has been reduced in this bill to that figure. There are certain small towns which do not have the advantages of the larger towns; they do not have the advantage of rural delivery. The department has endeavored to make experiments in those places to see to what extent they could improve the mail facilities, which are really worse in some of the small villages than they are in the country districts.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Was it agreed by unanimous consent that the committee amendments should be first considered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, I desire to withdraw my amendment, because I had forgotten that for the moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order at the present time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask that that provision in the bill go over until to-morrow, as some other Senators desire to speak on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been agreed to, and there is nothing to go over. It will be subject to amendment to-morrow.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Postal savings system," on page 31, line 17, after the words "straps," to insert "baskets," and in the same line, after the word "repair," to strike out "baskets," so as to make the clause read:

For supplies for the City Delivery Service, including satchels, straps, baskets, and their repair, time cards, time-recorder supplies, maps, transfer designs, and stencils, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 5, after "$100,000" to insert "Provided, That $6,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended immediately after the passage of this act for the purchase of dies for letter boxes," so as to make the clause read:

For equipment for City Delivery Service, including letter boxes, letter-box fasteners, package boxes, posts, furniture, trucks, and time-card frames, $100,000: Provided, That $6,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended immediately after the passage of this act for the purchase of dies for letter boxes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the amendment of the committee on page 33 just read by the Secretary is rather a radical departure from the policy of the Post Office Department. As I understand, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General proposes to go down to the navy yard or some other place and make certain dies for letter boxes, which have heretofore and are now being actually made and contracted for by private individuals and corporations. I raise the point of order that this is in the nature of new legislation and should not be retained in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any law that authorizes the making of the dies for letter boxes?

Mr. PENROSE. No, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the point of order is overruled.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not understand the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that unless there is some general law upon the subject the point of order is overruled.

Mr. PENROSE. The law at the present time authorizes the contracting for these dies with private individuals. I should like to have this matter go over until to-morrow, so that the Chair may look into it, and I want to be heard on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator from Pennsylvania whether there was any law on the subject, and he said there was not.

Mr. PENROSE. My mind is not clear as to what the existing law is, and if the chairman of the committee will consent to having this passed over I should be glad to have that done.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think all the law is contained in this appropriation:

For equipment for City Delivery Service, including letter boxes, letter-box fasteners, package boxes, posts, furniture, trucks, and time-card frames, $100,000.

There is no law on the subject except that, as I understand it.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all.

Mr. SWANSON. This is to authorize these dies to be purchased as much as to rent them or lease them, and the purchases to be made where it can be done to the advantage of the Government. I do not see how it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It appears that for equipment for City Delivery Service, etc., including certain things, $100,000 is appropriated. Then there is couched in the language and under the guise of a proviso a provision that a part of this sum that is authorized to be spent for certain specific purposes herein enumerated is to be diverted and spent for another purpose that does not appear by law to be authorized. It seems to me that under the guise of a limitation upon an appropriation for a specific purpose it is an authorization for a different purpose. I was confused by the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has no doubt, has he, that the Congress of the United States has a right to expend this money for post-office purposes as it pleases?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, I think the money must be spent as directed by Congress, and if Congress directs that $100,000 shall be spent for letter boxes, letter-box fasteners, package boxes, posts, furniture, trucks, and time-card frames, I do not think the Senate can add an amendment to a general appropriation bill legislating, under the guise of a limitation, that part of this money shall be spent for something else. When the Chair asked the question whether there was any law authorizing this proviso, and was informed that there was no law, I expected that the Chair was going to sustain the point of order because there was no law authorizing it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. Why could not the Senate, if it wanted to, amend this and provide that not more than $6,000 should be used for letter boxes, or any other amount, for that purpose?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly they could put a limitation in the nature of a proviso upon the amount to be spent for each purpose for which they had authorized the expenditure; but that is not what they attempt to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Exactly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The House authorizes this $100,000 to be spent for certain enumerated objects. The Senate says: "Provided, That a part of it shall be spent for something else," which, as it seems to me, is legislation on an appropriation bill. Of course that is only my opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless there is some law of the United States that fixes how dies for letter boxes are to be bought, the Chair will be compelled to overrule the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 33, line 23, after the word "operation," to strike out "$325,000" and insert "$300,000," so as to make the clause read:

For rental and purchase of canceling machines and baling presses, including cost of power in rented buildings, motors, repairs to motors, and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation, $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next committee amendment proposes to strike out all after line 9, on page 35, down to and including line 24, on page 57, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the act approved August 24, 1912, being "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," is hereby amended as follows: At the end of section 5 of said act, after the word "service," insert the following: "Provided, That compensatory time for Sunday service during the month of December in any year may be allowed during the month of January next succeeding."

SEC. 3. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public.

SEC. 4. That on and after July 1, 1915, when the total compensation of any postmaster at a post office of the fourth class for four consecutive quarters shall amount to $1,000, exclusive of commissions on money orders issued, and the receipts of such post office for the same period shall aggregate as much as $1,900, the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall so report to the Postmaster General, who shall, in pursuance of such report, assign such post office to its proper class, to become effective at the beginning of the next succeeding quarterly period, and fix the salary of the postmaster accordingly.

SEC. 5. That so much of section 1 of the "Act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, which provides that the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

SEC. 7. That when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereafter authorized, in his discretion, to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal, or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territories, commencing about March 25, 1913.

SEC. 8. That so much of section 4 of "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. That hereafter the Postmaster General may transfer, under such regulations as he may prescribe, clerks or carriers from post offices of the first and second classes to the Railway Mail Service at salaries not exceeding the salary which the clerks or carriers are receiving in the post offices at the time of such transfer, with the consent of the clerk or carrier.

SEC. 10. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from and after the 30th day of June, 1915, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following four classes, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage car service, and closed pouch service.

Full railway post office car mail service shall be service by cars 40 feet or more in length, constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. The authorizations of full railway post office cars shall be for standard size cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Apartment railway post office car mail service shall be service by apartments less than 40 feet in length in cars constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. Two standard sizes of apartment railway post office cars may be authorized and paid for, namely, apartments 15 feet and 30 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Storage-car mail service shall be service by cars used for the storage and carriage of mails in transit other than by full and apartment railway post-office cars. The authorizations for storage cars shall be for cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized in baggage cars.

Service by full and apartment railway post-office cars and storage cars shall include the carriage therein of all mail matter, equipment, and supplies for the mail service and the employees of the Postal Service or Post Office Department as shall be directed by the Postmaster General to be so carried.

Closed pouch mail service shall be the transportation and handling by railroad employees of mails on trains on which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not authorized, except as hereinbefore provided.

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely:

For full railway post office car mail service at not exceeding 21 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

For apartment railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 10½ cents for each mile of service by a 30-foot apartment car and 5½ cents for each mile of service by a 15-foot apartment car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car, and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

For storage-car mail service at not exceeding 20 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Where authorizations are made for cars of the standard lengths of 60, 30, and 15 feet, as provided by this act, and the railroad company is unable to furnish such cars of the length authorized, but furnishes cars of lesser length than those authorized, but which are determined by the department to be sufficient for the service, the Postmaster General may accept the same and pay only for the actual space furnished and used, the compensation to be not exceeding pro rata of that provided by this act for the standard length so authorized: Provided, That the Postmaster General may accept cars and apartments of greater length than those of the standard requested, but no compensation shall be allowed for such excess lengths.

For closed-pouch service, on routes upon which closed-pouch service only is performed, at not exceeding the rates of compensation provided by existing law for average daily weights of mail carried over the whole route; on routes upon which apartment railway post-office car and closed-pouch services are performed, at not exceeding $20 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight of mails carried, and at pro rata of such rate of compensation for each 100 pounds of average daily weight greater or less than 2,000 pounds; and on routes upon which full railway post-office car and closed-pouch services or full railway post-office car, apartment car, and closed-pouch services are performed, at not exceeding $19 per mile per annum for each 2,000 pounds average daily weight of mails carried, and at pro rata of such rate of compensation for each 100 pounds of average daily weight greater or less than 2,000 pounds, the average daily weights to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails.

The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations on their routes without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service otherwise: Provided, That the Postmaster General, in his discretion, may relieve any of the roads of such service.

Railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation otherwise authorized by this act.

The initial and terminal rates provided for herein shall cover expenses of loading and unloading mails, switching, lighting, heating, cleaning mail cars, and all other expenses incidental to station service and required by the Postmaster General in connection with the mails that are not included in the car-mile rate. The allowance for full railway post-office cars, apartment railway post-office cars, and storage cars may be varied in accordance with the approximate difference in their respective cost of construction and maintenance.

For the purpose of ascertaining the average weight of closed-pouch mails per day upon which to adjust compensation, the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to have such mails carried on the several routes weighed by the employees of the Post Office Department for such a number of successive days, not less than 35, at such times after the passage of this act as he may direct, and not less frequently than once in every year thereafter, the result to be stated and certified in such form and manner as he may direct. In computing the average weight of mails per day carried on a railroad route, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor. The expense of taking the weights of mails and the compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings, for assistance in completing computations, and of rentals, if necessary, in Washington, D. C., shall be paid out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

In computing the car-miles of the full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless otherwise mutually agreed upon.

In computing the car-miles of storage cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement, or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

New service and additional service may be authorized at not exceeding the rates herein provided, and service may be reduced or discontinued, with pro rata reductions in pay, as the needs of the Postal Service may require: Provided, That no additional pay shall be allowed for additional closed-pouch service on established routes until the next regular readjustment of pay therefor on such routes, and no additional pay shall be allowed for additional car service unless specifically authorized by the Postmaster General.

All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such construction, style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by and at the expense of the railroad companies. No pay shall be allowed for service by any railway post-office car which is not sound in material and construction and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned. No pay shall be allowed for service by any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for service by any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars, or between the engine and a steel car adjoining. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used, or pay for service by, any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railway company not conforming to these provisions on August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all full railway post-office cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies hereafter shall be constructed of steel. Until July 1, 1917, in cases of emergency and in cases where the necessities of the service require it, the Postmaster General may provide for service by full railway post-office cars of other than steel or steel underframe construction, and fix therefor such rate of compensation within the maximum herein provided as shall give consideration to the inferior character of construction, and the railroad companies shall furnish service by such cars at such rates so fixed.

Service over property owned or controlled by another company or a terminal company shall be considered service of the railroad company using such property and not that of the other or terminal company: Provided, That service over a land-grant road shall be paid for as herein provided.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall furnish all necessary facilities for caring for and handling them while in their custody. They shall furnish all cars or parts of cars used in the transportation and distribution of the mails, except as is herein otherwise provided, and place them in stations before the departure of trains at such times and when required to do so. They shall provide station space and rooms for handling, distribution, and transfer of mails in transit, and for offices and rooms for the employees of the Postal Service engaged in such transportation, when required by the Postmaster General.

Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails, and when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General shall in all cases decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed. Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and with due speed all mailable matter, equipment, and supplies directed to be carried thereon. If any such railroad company shall fail or refuse to transport the mails, equipment, and supplies when required by the Postmaster General on any train or trains it operates, such company shall be fined such reasonable amount as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of railroad companies carrying the mails under the provisions of this act for reduction in service or in frequency of service where, in his judgment, the importance of the facilities withdrawn or reduced requires it, and impose fines upon them for delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the value of the service in cases where it is not performed, and not exceeding three times its value if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the railroad company.

The provisions of this section shall apply to service operated by railroad companies partly by railroad and partly by steamboats.

The provisions of this section respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall submit, under oath, when, and in such form as may be required by the Postmaster General, evidence as to the performance of service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes, and hereafter detailed estimates shall be submitted for such services in the annual Book of Estimates.

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for the determination of a postal carload or less-than-carload rate for transportation of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and may provide for and authorize such transportation, when practicable, at such rates, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to provide and perform such service at such rates and on the conditions prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, distinguish between the several classes of mail matter and provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and periodicals, when lower rates for transportation or other economies may be secured thereby without material detriment to the service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to return to the mails, when practicable for the utilization of car space paid for and not needed for the mails, postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the Postal Service.

The Postmaster General, in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this section to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

The Postmaster General may have the weights of mail taken on railroad mail routes and computations of the average loads of the several classes of cars and other computations for statistical and administrative purposes made at such times as he may elect, and pay the expense thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

That the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, are hereby made available for the purposes of this section.

SEC. 11. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

SEC. 12. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's orders Nos. 7720 and 7721, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages, and admitting books to the parcel-post classification, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after January 1, 1914, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 1 per cent thereof per annum.

SEC. 13. That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails quantities of not less than 500 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter mailed at the special rates of 1 cent and 2 cents a copy and of 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter without postage stamps affixed: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter.

SEC. 14. That such part of section 6 of the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a system of postal savings depositories as reads "but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month" is hereby amended to read as follows: "But the balance to the credit of any person upon which interest is payable, shall not exceed $1,000, exclusive of accumulated interest"; and said act is further amended so as to repeal the proviso in section 7 thereof and insert in lieu of such proviso the following: "Provided, That the board of trustees may, in their discretion, and under such regulations as such board may promulgate, accept additional deposits not to exceed in the aggregate $1,000 for each depositor but upon which no interest shall be paid."

SEC. 15. That if any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor.

SEC. 16. That whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when, from any other cause, there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding one year, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law: Provided, That the cost of temporary service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any accepted bidder to enter into contract or a contractor to perform service shall be charged to such bidder or contractor.

SEC. 17. That section 3949 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All contracts for carrying the mail should be in the name of the United States, and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement: Provided, however, That such contracts require due celerity, certainty, and security in the performance of the service; but the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract."

SEC. 18. That the act of March 4, 1909 (ch. 321, sec. 198, 35 Stat., p. 1126), be amended to read as follows:

"Whoever shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route, or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle, or shall willfully aid or assist in any of the aforementioned offenses, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years."

SEC. 19. That section 3938 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All letters of domestic origin which can not be delivered by postmasters shall be sent to the Post Office Department, and such as contain inclosures of value, other than correspondence, shall be recorded. If the sender or addressee can not be identified, such letters shall be held for a period of one year awaiting reclamation. If within one year they have not been claimed, they shall be disposed of as the Postmaster General may direct.

"All other undeliverable letters shall be disposed of without record and not held for reclamation."

SEC. 20. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders has been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies.

SEC. 21. That on and after July 1, 1915, the compensation of each rural letter carrier for serving a rural route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum, payable monthly; on routes 22 miles and less than 24 miles, $1,152; on routes 20 miles and less than 22 miles, $1,080; on routes 18 miles and less than 20 miles, $960; on routes 16 miles and less than 18 miles, $840; on routes 14 miles and less than 16 miles, $720; on routes 12 miles and less than 14 miles, $672; on routes 10 miles and less than 12 miles, $624; on routes 8 miles and less than 10 miles, $576; on routes 6 miles and less than 8 miles, $528; on routes 4 miles and less than 6 miles, $480. A rural letter carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half of the combined length of the two routes: Provided, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

SEC. 22. That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay an additional compensation to rural carriers, out of the appropriation for village delivery service, a sum not to exceed $150 per annum in any individual case for delivering mail at second and third class post offices not now by law entitled to free delivery service.

SEC. 23. That the act approved January 21, 1914 (Pub., 49), authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty, be so amended as to include Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks.

SEC. 24. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is a whole series of sections there on different matters.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that section 21, on page 56, relating to the rural letter carriers, be passed over.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands, then, that except as to section 21, beginning on line 14, of page 56, and ending at line 15, on page 57, the amendments are agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there some other objections?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, section 19 has no relation to these matters of routes or railroads, and it is an amendment for which there has been a great deal of demand—an amendment to the law for the purpose of getting a record of letters of value. At present a man undertakes to pay a bill and the people have moved, and he has no record. This does not add to the expense in any way, but provides for a record and for holding it for a period of a year. I do not see what objection there can be to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the objection to it is that the bill was framed upon the idea that this is strictly an appropriation bill, and all new legislation was eliminated. That is the theory upon which we have been proceeding, and this is certainly new legislation.

Mr. LODGE. No point of order would lie against it, because it is a House provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. LODGE. You can not make a point of order on a House provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have not made a point of order. We simply left it out of the bill upon the theory that all new legislation should be eliminated. This matter has all got to go into conference.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that; but I do not see what objection there could be to that provision. It involves no expense.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there are a number of propositions here that are very valuable, but upon which there would be considerable discussion; and the committee decided, inasmuch as this was an appropriation bill, that it would limit the bill to items of appropriation. If we took up the general legislation covered by these sections after page 35, we would be here for days considering this appropriation bill. It would take a week or more; and there seemed to be but one fair way to do it, and that was to limit it to appropriations.

Mr. LODGE. Is it the understanding of the committee that the House is going to assent at once?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course we do not know what the House will do; but I will say to the Senator that there were some members of the committee who were in favor of certain provisions and some in favor of others. On the other hand, there were some equally opposed to the provisions of the Moon bill, so called. There is a provision there for revision of the method of railway mail pay. It is all involved in this. There is a difference between the bill as incorporated into this appropriation bill and the bill recommended by the joint commission of Congress. A consideration of that question would take days, and perhaps weeks.

Mr. LODGE. That amounts to leaving it all in the hands of the conference committee to legislate.

Mr. BRYAN. It does not take away from the Senate the power to pass upon it finally.

Mr. LODGE. Then, also, I should like to ask what has become of the provision about the biennial promotions?

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator evidently has been out of the Chamber. The Senate has disagreed to the amendment and restored the House provision, so that the old law as to promotions will remain in force.

Mr. LODGE. I came in just as they got to this point. Section 19 is a mere matter of convenience to a great mass of people, and I should think it could be left in in conference without any serious trouble.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I understand that on page 21, the Senate committee amendment, relating to letter carriers, was disagreed to. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who was compelled to leave the Chamber on important business, is interested in lines 10 to 16, on page 21, relating to letter carriers. I ask that that may go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that; the committee amendment has been rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber that I was unable to hear what the Senator said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] requested me to ask, on his behalf, that the provisions of the bill, on page 21, relating to letter carriers—that is, the House bill—go over until to-morrow. He desired to be heard briefly on that matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He evidently meant rural carriers. That is section 21.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have agreed to pass that over until to-morrow at the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and others who said they could not be here.

Mr. POINDEXTER. You have already agreed to do that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; we have already agreed to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any exception, then, besides section 21? The question is on agreeing to the other amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Two or three days ago information came to me authoritatively that the President and Members of the Cabinet were being very much annoyed and worried by the reception of letters threatening the destruction of life and property, and all that sort of thing. The matter was called to the attention of the Attorney General. He looked up the matter and said there was no statute by which parties could be punished for mailing letters of that character. He prepared an amendment, which I understand of course is new legislation and subject to a point of order under the rule we have been following; but I hope a point of order will not be raised against this amendment, in order that parties who are guilty of offenses of this sort may be punished when they are apprehended and tried. I should like to have the Secretary read the amendment prepared by the Attorney General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the bill by adding a new section after line 9, on page 35, as follows:

SEC. 2. Any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited in the mails any letter, circular, card, or other missive containing any threat to take the life of or to inflict grievous bodily harm upon the President of the United States or any officer entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, upon conviction thereof shall be fined not to exceed $1,000 or shall be imprisoned for not more than three years; and any person who shall otherwise make any such threat, or, with intent to kill or to inflict grievous bodily harm, shall make or attempt to make any assault upon the President or any officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall likewise upon conviction be fined not to exceed $1,000 or be imprisoned not more than three years.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course I would not think of making a point of order against legislation of this character. I simply rose to express my amazement that the matter was not already covered by law. Of course I accept the opinion of the Attorney General that it is not.

I do not see why the amendment should apply only to offenses of that character aimed at these gentlemen while they are engaged in their official capacity. I should think that anybody who mailed a letter threatening the life of anybody ought to be guilty of a crime, whether he did it because the official had committed some public act of which he did not approve or not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I understand that the present statute covers cases where assaults are made upon the President or those who are entitled to succession, but there is no statute, so the Attorney General says, that punishes a man for mailing a letter of this character. They have one gentleman under arrest now who admits that he wrote the letter. I saw a copy of the letter, and it is a bad letter, I may say; and there is no way of punishing him under the statute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is this prohibition against the man who simply mails the letter or the writer of the letter?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is against the man who knowingly mails the letter as well as the writer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should be glad to have the Secretary repeat just the first few words of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited in the mails any letter, circular, card, or other missive—

And so forth.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. If the chairman will permit me, this matter came up a few years ago, when I was chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, by reason of a similar outbreak, I believe, from some so-called anarchists in Paterson, N. J. I agree with the Attorney General and the chairman of the committee that the law is defective in this connection; but I know that at that time the committee, while anxious to do something, were unable to agree on the character of the amendment. This amendment does not impress me, from the hasty consideration I have been able to give to it from hearing it read, as being complete, and I ask the Senate to let it go over until to-morrow, so that I may examine some of the amendments that were offered in the committee at that time and examine this one a little more carefully.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this amendment was prepared, so I am advised, by the Attorney General or some one in his office under his direction and supervision.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not suppose the source is infallible, although it is high.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I quite agree with that.

Mr. PENROSE. It can be offered just as well to-morrow. There will not be many letters coming in between now and the enactment of this law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It might be well to state that the Chair turned over a letter in which it was proposed to blow up the Senate with nitroglycerin. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. The Chair might be liable, under this amendment, for transferring the letter across the desk.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know who drew the amendment, but as I glance at it the amendment does not provide that the man who mailed the letter must know the contents of the letter, but if he knowingly mails it he is guilty of a crime. I suppose anybody who drops a letter in the mail knows that he drops it in.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This amendment is up to the Senate, Mr. President. They can make any disposition of it they please. I do not think it ought to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not see why this letter should not cover Senators and others. I sometimes take an unpopular course in the field of political activity, and I receive a great many abusive letters, and I should like a little protection from such missives.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not President, and he is not in line of succession. This is only intended for those who expect to succeed the President.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, in these days no one can tell who will be President. I am for myself until I see a better man. [Laughter.] But, leaving that suggestion aside, I really think Senators are entitled to protection. I know the Senator would sympathize with me if he could see some of the letters I have received.

I suggest that this matter go over until to-morrow. It is evidently incomplete and hastily prepared.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think when the Senator seriously thinks about this he will not insist upon its going over.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be printed and let us consider it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire to protest against this or any other part of the bill going over until to-morrow. This evening session was provided that the pending appropriation bill might be passed. Senators on both sides of the Chamber understood that situation. It is now proposed to permit all those parts of the bill about which there is any controversy to go over and consume another day. I shall object to it as far as I may.

Mr. PENROSE. It already has been agreed that the rural-carrier proposition goes over until to-morrow, and it is evident that we can not complete the bill to-night.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana will take a casual look around the Senate Chamber and decide that we can force a vote on this proposition to-night, I should like to have him tell me how he can do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Wait a minute. The matter referred to has gone over until to-morrow. It went over because we were notified that certain gentlemen desire to be heard on certain provisions of the bill, and that they could not possibly remain here. It is perfectly evident if we undertake to press it that the question of a quorum will be raised.

Mr. FLETCHER. In my judgment, Senators ought to understand that we must stay here and do business or quit. That is all there is to it. These gentlemen were notified to be here, and if they are not here they can be gotten here. We ought not to waste time in taking up bills and let every question that any one has any point about go over until to-morrow. If we pursue that course, we will never get through with the appropriation bills.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This bill has been completed so far as the Senate committee is concerned except one item in it. I do not see how the Senator can say that the time is being frittered away.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not talking about what has been acted upon, but I am referring to items going over until to-morrow.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator, in all kindliness, if I may be allowed to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has that opportunity now.

Mr. LANE. Right now?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Right now. I will withdraw the amendment that I offered.

Mr. SMOOT (to Mr. BANKHEAD). Do not withdraw it. Let it be adopted.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest that the amendment be adopted and that any Senator who wishes may reserve the right to move to amend it when the bill reaches the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not withdraw the amendment. I do not want to be in the position of objecting to it. Let him offer it and let it be adopted, and I will reserve the right to move to amend it, if I see fit, when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all right. Let the question be put on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr BRYAN. On page 23, line 11, before the word "purchase," I move to insert the word "exchange" and a comma, so as to read "for the purchase, exchange, and maintenance of wagons or automobiles."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, and that is why I made the remark which I did. I have two amendments which were submitted to me some time ago and I promised to introduce them. Here is one of them, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after line 17, insert:

The sum of $200,000 due the estates of deceased colored soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and which was in the hands of the commissioner of the Freedman's Bureau and which have been repaid into the Treasury of the United States, be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to build a national home for aged and infirm colored people and for working girls, and to establish industrial farms for the maintenance of the same, the building or buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia upon land owned or to be owned by the association known as the Home for Aged and Infirm Colored People, duly incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia for the purpose specified in this act; and the said industrial farm to be established in the State of Virginia upon good agricultural land owned or to be owned by the same: Provided, That no money shall be paid to the said association until the Postmaster General of the United States has investigated and reported to the Secretary of the Treasury that such association is legally incorporated for the relief of colored people. The plans and specifications and contracts must be submitted to and approved by the Postmaster General, and the money only taken from the Treasury by such vouchers as may be drawn by the association, approved by the Secretary, as the work progresses; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay the money hereby appropriated to the said association upon the fulfillment of the terms herein specified, and the said association must give good and sufficient bonds to the Postmaster General for the faithful expenditures of the money herein appropriated.

The commissioner of the Freedman's Saving & Trust Co. and his successors in office are authorized and directed to pay, or cause to be paid, under such regulations as said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, to all depositors in the Freedman's Savings & Trust Co. whose accounts have been properly verified and balanced under existing laws, or to their heirs or legal representatives, a sum of money equal to the verified balance due said depositors from said company at the time of its failure, less the amount of dividends which may have been paid from the assets of said company; and for this purpose the sum of $1,291,744.50 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, said amount to be placed to the credit of the said commissioner by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of this act specified; and the clerical expense for the settlement of these claims shall be paid out of the money herein appropriated; and none of said accounts which have been sold, transferred or assigned by said depositors, their heirs or legal representatives, shall be allowed or paid under the provisions of this act: Provided, That any money not called for within two years after the passage of this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

It shall be unlawful for any person to directly or indirectly accept or receive from any such depositor, or from any heir or legal representative of any such depositor, or from any beneficiary of this act, any compensation for any service rendered or claimed to be or to have been rendered in the collection or payment of said deposit. Any person who shall violate this section shall be punished by a fine of double the amount as accepted or received and not more than $1,000 in addition thereto, or by imprisonment of not more than one year, or both.

Mr. BRYAN. I raise a point of order against the amendment. It is so evidently a private claim——

Mr. LANE. Let me make an explanation.

Mr. BRYAN. Just a minute. Let me state the point of order.

Mr. LANE. I wish to make an explanation.

Mr. BRYAN. No; I wish to make my point of order first. Evidently it is a private claim and violates paragraph 4 of Rule XVI, and it would not be courteous to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE. I wish to say in explanation——

Mr. BRYAN. I raise the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. LANE. Does the Senator do that to shut me out?

Mr. BRYAN. It is not in order. It violates paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

Mr. LANE. Then, Mr. President, I rise to a matter of personal privilege. I introduced this amendment in good faith and with the assurance that the distinguished Senators who are now raising the point of order against it were in favor of having it passed in connection with this bill. I have not looked into it. I have been very busy on committee work and other work and I have not studied it. I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, and if it is subject to a point of order I will withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LANE. Then I withdraw it.

Now, with the kind permission of the gentlemen I will give them something which will furnish them food for thought. I wish to offer another amendment to the bill. At the end of the bill or anywhere where it will go in and fit nicely, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all limitations upon the amount that may be deposited in postal savings banks be removed, and that the rate of interest paid by the Federal Government upon such deposits be increased to 3 per cent per annum, and the money that may hereafter be deposited in postal savings banks shall be used as a basis for the formation of a rural credit system in this country.

I offer that as an amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LANE. I would like to inquire if this amendment is subject to a point of order? It calls for no appropriation of money from the Government. The people of this country are demanding just such legislation incidentally as we go slipping by with other kinds. We did pass a bill last year in which we created a credit system, an emergency currency system, in which the farming people and the small home owners and the little man secured no benefit whatever. He had to go and borrow his money from the usual sources, and at the same time his property backed the currency which the Government authorized to be reloaned to him at a higher rate. I should like to have this amendment adopted, so that he might receive some benefit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that there will be a point of order raised on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. I should like to have a roll call on the amendment. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill and obnoxious to the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the point of order is made, the Chair will be compelled to sustain it. There is a law in reference to postal deposits.

Mr. LANE. The amendment goes out on a point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have an amendment here, which I should like to have read, and ask the chairman of the committee whether he will accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 8, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That letter carriers assigned to collection service who were promoted to the higher grades, in accordance with the classification act approved March 2, 1907, and whose salaries have been reduced during the past year, through no delinquency or charges of misconduct on their part, shall be restored to their former grades.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Was unanimous consent given that a certain paragraph of the bill should go over until to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not as the Chair understands it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood it so. I thought without objection the matter went over until the next day, and there was no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. It is section 21, on page 56.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to understand the parliamentary situation, that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The statement was made that section 21 was to go over until to-morrow, and the total, on page 30. As to that being a unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair does not know how it would be construed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume, of course, that where it goes over without any objection it is done by unanimous consent. There was no vote about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. None whatever.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, there is so much confusion we can not hear on this side what the Senator from Connecticut is saying.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply asked the Chair whether the paragraph to which the Senator from Alabama alluded a few minutes ago as having gone over until to-morrow had gone over.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reference to the pay of rural carriers?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I asked whether it had gone over by unanimous consent or not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It did, as I understand it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if that is so, we can not pass the bill to-night.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are through with the bill, so far as we are concerned, until a vote can be had on the item which was unanimously passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say, I do not see how we can do any more with the bill to-night.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to be inserted as an additional section at the end of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to the bill as an additional section the following:

IMPROVING ROADS FOR RURAL DELIVERY SERVICE.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $500,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the Postmaster General, in improving the condition of roads to be selected by the Postmaster General over which rural delivery is or may hereafter be established, such improvement to be for the purpose of increasing the territory which could be served by each carrier as a result of such improvement, the increasing of the number of delivery days in each year, and to establish a relative saving to the Government in the operation of the Rural Delivery Service and to the local inhabitants in the transportation of their products by reason of such improvement: And provided, That such improvements shall be made under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, and that for the carrying out of this act the necessary expenses for the rental of buildings and clerical and other assistance in the city of Washington and elsewhere shall be deducted from the amount herein appropriated. That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General are hereby directed to report to the Congress within one year after the ratification of this act the result of their operations under the same, the number of miles of road improved, the cost of the same, and such other information as they may have acquired in connection with the operation of this act, together with such recommendations as shall seem wise for providing a general plan of maintenance of postal roads in cooperation with the States and counties, and for providing the necessary funds for the further carrying out of such plans of national aid, if it shall be deemed feasible to provide the same, or any part thereof, otherwise than by appropriation from the Treasury for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if that was estimated for?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it was not estimated for. Mr. President, I desire to say simply this with reference to the amendment: In the Post Office appropriation bill in the year 1912 a provision similar to this was inserted in conference. That provision appropriated the same amount proposed here, $500,000, for experimental work on postal routes for the purpose of getting the information provided for in this amendment. Under the direction of the Division of Public Roads in the Department of Agriculture and the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General those roads are being constructed in various States throughout the country. I am advised by them that they have secured very satisfactory results, but they really need additional funds in order to complete the work and obtain the information that was desired and asked for in the act of 1912.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Where were these experiments made? I have never heard of them in my State.

Mr. SIMMONS. In quite a number of States.

Mr. WARREN. Where was the money expended?

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably a larger sum is being expended in the State of Ohio than in any other State in the Union.

Mr. WARREN. I would be glad to have specifications about the expenditure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think a part of it, about $30,000, is being expended in my own State. Some of it has been expended in Kentucky. It has been pretty generally expended, I think, and roads are being constructed in quite a number of States under the provisions of the act of 1912.

Mr. WARREN. I would be very glad to know specifically the States. I have no doubt the Senator is right as to the States he mentioned, but I should like to have the others.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that money has been expended for this purpose in quite a number of States.

Mr. SWANSON. The money was to be divided among all the States, every State having the privilege of taking it, and because of those that refused it was given to other States. I understand that the Government proposed to give $10,000 to each State that furnished an equal amount. The States that would not comply with the law produced a surplus which was afterwards divided among the States that would comply with the law. I understand it was done in that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Chair would like to know who has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have the floor, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three Senators have taken it without asking for it. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that I addressed the Chair and was not undertaking to speak before I was given the privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to have some semblance or order, and wanted to begin at some point and to have an understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the State of Utah wanted the amount that was allotted to each State and I know she did not get it. Some question arose and they said it was all divided out and we could not get any.

But, Mr. President, that is not the reason for which I rose. I thought the Senator from North Carolina was through. I want to say that as soon as he is through I shall make a point of order against the proposed amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have here a list of States that participated in the distribution of this fund. It is as follows:

Alabama, $10,000; Maryland, $14,400; Tennessee, $20,800; Maine, $65,000; North Carolina, $34,000; South Carolina, $9,600; Virginia, $39,500; Iowa, $40,000; Oregon, $10,000; Kentucky, $13,100; Mississippi, $50,000; Ohio, $120,000; Texas, $75,580.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator from Utah will not insist upon his point of order. Of course, I will admit that the amendment is subject to a point of order, but it is very good legislation. The results that have been obtained up to this time, I am told by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and by the Director of Public Roads, have been good, but they have not enough money to carry it on in a way which would get the necessary information they desire to obtain. At their instance, very largely, I have offered this amendment for an additional appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to make the point of order against the item. There is a good-roads bill now on the calendar of the Senate, and I think what money is appropriated for good roads in the future by the Government ought to be appropriated and expended in a systematic way, and that a plan ought to be adopted and followed up. For that reason I make the point of order that this item is not estimated for, and also that it is not moved by direction of a standing or select committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the Senator takes his seat——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that I do not regard this as exactly in the line of good-roads legislation. It is not offered as a good-roads proposition, because, if it were, the amount is too inconsequential. It is offered for the purpose of obtaining information with reference to the effect upon the cost of carrying the rural mails and the parcel post through the country where the roads are good and where the roads are bad, in order that the department may report back to Congress the results of their investigation and furnish us data upon which to base a comprehensive good-roads plan.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina if it is not a fact that a large part of the money heretofore appropriated was expended in building fanciful roads in different places, where probably there is very little rural delivery? Is it not a fact that $120,000 was spent in the State of Ohio, and that nearly all of it went to build a vitrified brick highway between two cities there in one particular locality? Was not quite an amount of money appropriated to Maryland and used to construct the macadam road between here and Chevy Chase Lake, where probably a rural carrier may go or he may not? I doubt whether or not that road is used by rural carriers. Is there any information of which the Senator from North Carolina ever heard that has been acquired with the half-million dollars that has been appropriated?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator, in response to his last inquiry, that I know a report upon that subject already has been made. With reference to how the money has been expended in Ohio and in Maryland, I am not able to give the Senator any information; but I am able to say to the Senator that in my own State I think three different roads have been selected for the expenditure of this money. The Government is contributing one-third, and the counties or townships through which the road passes contribute the other two-thirds. I myself personally consulted with the Postmaster General and the Director of Good Roads in connection with the selection of the roads upon which this money was to be expended; and I know, as a matter of fact, that they were exceedingly particular in securing routes where the question of rural delivery probably would be raised and where information with respect to that matter would be developed.

I do not know with reference to Ohio. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is present and probably can answer; but my impression is, judging from the solicitude of the Post Office Department with reference to selecting routes that would afford the information that was desired and asked for in this act, that in other States they have exercised the same good judgment and the same caution as has been exercised in North Carolina.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question before he takes his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is it the Senator is now discussing? The Chair understood that a point of order had been raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The Chair has been ready for some time to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah is going to insist upon his point of order, of course I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to insist on it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall submit to the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After hearing full discussion of the point of order, the Chair sustains it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama understands that this is as far as we can go with the pending bill to-night.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true, Mr. President; and if there is no other business I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I have the floor, Mr. President, and I wish to make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 20189, known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would it not be better for the Senator to permit me to ask that the pending bill be laid aside temporarily?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I am willing to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Post Office appropriation bill will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall object to laying aside the Post Office appropriation bill, Mr. President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there objection to laying the bill aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; there is objection to the request.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 20189.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 20189, known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. What is the bill, Mr. President?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Florida that I understood that as soon as the Post Office appropriation bill was passed, with the exception of the one item referring to rural carriers, the Senate would take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I say yes; that is what I understood.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know from whom the Senator understood it; it was not from me.

Mr. KERN. The understanding is exactly to the contrary.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	James	Penrose	Thomas
Brandegee	Kern	Pittman	Thompson
Bristow	Lane	Pomerene	Vardaman
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Walsh
Burton	Lewis	Shafroth	Weeks
Camden	Lodge	Sheppard	White
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Williams
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Hollis	Oliver	Smoot
Hughes	Page	Swanson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators and the Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a question of order, which is that the motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was going to put the question. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate adjourn. The question is on that motion. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye"——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Chair has not put the negative as yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that. All in favor of the motion will say "aye." Contrary, "no." The "noes" have it.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. PENROSE. Division!

Mr. FLETCHER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that, but a division has been called for. Those in favor of the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until counted. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The motion is clearly lost.

The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the rule provide that when the lack of a quorum is disclosed the list of absentees shall be called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not, except on motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought we had amended the rules so as to provide for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ROBINSON entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. MYERS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Thereupon (at 7 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Tuesday, February 23, 1915) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 24, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We realize, O God our heavenly Father, that Thou art a righteous God, and that Thou desirest righteousness of us. Help us to accentuate it, we beseech Thee, in thought, word, and deed this day, that we may prove ourselves worthy recipients of Thy boundless love. In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 21318, the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question in reference to Senate amendment 47, on page 57 of the print that we have, appropriating $25,000 to continue the work of collecting, and so forth, Revolutionary War records. My recollection is—and I am quite sure it is correct—that when we passed the act providing for the collection of these records we put a limit of cost upon the expenditure. This of course extends the limit of cost. I do not know whether it does any good to put a limit of cost on propositions or not; apparently it seems to have no effect anywhere. Was this item brought to the attention of the House committee in the consideration of the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Without attempting to commit the managers on the part of the House——

Mr. MANN. I am asking if it was brought to the attention of the House committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Last year we took testimony which showed that it would cost a million dollars, and this year they brought it down to $500,000; but they never have yet made an estimate that any reasonable, intelligent man would be justified in recommending.

Mr. MANN. The original limit of cost was $25,000, and that was appropriated. I notice in the report on this work that the money seems to be used principally in paying the salary of one officer who draws another salary from the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He is the general superintendent.

Mr. MANN. I refer to a retired officer drawing pay as a retired officer; and the principal items of expense out of the money heretofore appropriated seems to be the payment to that retired officer of $200 a month for his services. I do not know what his services may be, but I suppose he is giving good service, although I can not see that they have accomplished very much up to date out of the $25,000 appropriated under a limit of cost of $25,000. Do the departments pay no attention at all to the laws that we pass fixing a limit of cost?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They thought it was an impertinence for Congress to make any such suggestion. [Laughter.] That is no joke; it is a fact.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask one other question. I see that the Senate has inserted an item to pay Mrs. Lurton, the wife of former Justice Lurton, one year's salary. I wonder whether it will become the policy of Congress to pay to the widows of all deceased justices and judges of the courts of the United States a year's salary upon the decease of the judge.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope not. That has been done only on two occasions, one in the case of Justice Harlan and the other in the case of Justice Brewer. This matter was suggested to the House committee in the last session of Congress. Justice Lurton had been on the Supreme Bench only a comparatively few years, although he had been occupying official positions for a great many years. I was one of those who did not believe that Congress was justified in granting a gratuity of a year's salary, although there were some able, earnest, and devoted public servants from the same State as Justice Lurton who earnestly urged the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have the widows of all the justices receive a year's salary, or 10 years' salary, if it could be done without paying it out of the Treasury and having the people first pay it into the Treasury. I think if this item should be agreed to, without any question it means that whenever any justice of the United States Supreme Court dies we pay a year's salary to the widow on an amendment offered in the Senate; and that will mean that everybody else in the Government service who draws a good salary will get the same gratuity; it will not apply to those who draw a small salary, because they would have no influence.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, I want to express the hope that the conferees will not undertake to decide this matter now until after the matter is fully gone into and discussed in conference. The gentleman from New York has already stated that there are two good precedents for this sort of a case. He also states that Justice Lurton has held official position for a great many years. That is true, but I want to call attention to the fact that he was judge on the circuit court bench for quite a number of years prior to his appointment to the Supreme Court bench. The gentleman knows that the salary of that court is not large. It is not a fact that the justice accumulated anything during those years, and I think the matter has a good deal of merit in it. I hope the gentleman will reserve his opinion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I am not stating any opinion.

Mr. MANN. And I am not asking the gentleman to express any opinion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am simply stating a previous condition of mind that might or might not disqualify me as an impartial juror.

Mr. MANN. I suppose if Mr. Justice Lurton had been from the State of Illinois and I had been besieged by everyone in the State to favor such an item as this that I very likely would be in favor of it, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is in favor of it now.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to be exactly right to single out the widow of a man who has been getting a very large compensation during his lifetime and pay her a year's salary, particularly at a time when the country is witnessing the spectacle of having all of the men who are engaged in the Postal Service of the country being called upon to sign waivers agreeing to a reduction of their salaries from $1,200 to $1,000 a year, and in the event of their refusal to sign such a waiver to sign another waiver which will put them out of the service, because of the shortage of funds. It seems to me that with this condition of things existing throughout the country, and it runs from one end of the country to the other, this is not a very good time to——

Mr. GORDON. To make donations.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; put it in that way. If a man drawing a salary of $12,000 a year, or whatever the compensation may be, is unable to save any part of that salary during his lifetime, it may be well to realize that the men who are drawing not to exceed $1,200 a year, having large families to support, may not be able to save very much out of their compensation, and I call particular attention to this because the Government, after these men have served anywhere from 15 to 25 years loyally and faithfully, now finds it necessary not only to refuse to pay compensation to their widows, but to reduce their compensation for the same work to be performed during their lifetime.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Senate amendment No. 46 proposes to reduce the appropriation for the valuation of railroads from $3,000,000 to $1,500,000, and I would not be willing that the House conferees should agree to that Senate amendment without an opportunity of having the matter discussed or voted upon in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should not either, although I might say to the gentleman that I doubt very much whether the amendment was made seriously, because, while this bill was more carefully scrutinized and debated in the Senate than any sundry civil appropriation bill in my experience in Congress, no one mentioned this particular item, which aroused some suspicion in my mind as to whether it was really intended to press it.

Mr. MANN. I know it is not proper to make a reference to the proceedings in the Senate, but I read the Senate proceedings on this bill, and I think that the Senator in charge of the bill deserves the commendation of the country for the way in which he handled it in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to have a separate vote on one of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. When does the gentleman desire it?

Mr. SISSON. I want it now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the gentleman refers to the appropriation for the Howard University?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not move now to concur in that amendment? I would be very pleased to move to concur in that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if we can have a vote upon this question without taking time to debate it, in order to test the feeling in the House, I shall move to concur in the amendment. If there is any desire to debate it, however, I do not wish to do that now, for I do not wish to stand in the way of the fortifications appropriation bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to debate it and explain my reasons for voting to disagree to the Senate amendment, but owing to the peculiar situation of the House I am willing to take the vote without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment 68. Page 119, after line 7, insert:

"HOWARD UNIVERSITY.

"For maintenance, to be used in payment of part of the salaries of the officers, professors, teachers, and other regular employees of the university, ice and stationery, the balance of which shall be paid from donations and other sources, of which sum not less than $1,500 shall be used for normal instruction, $65,000;

"For tools, materials, fuel, wages of instructors, and other necessary expenses of the department of manual arts, $12,000;

"For books, shelving, furniture, and fixtures for the libraries, $1,500;

"For improvement of grounds and repairs of buildings, to be immediately available, $10,000;

"Medical department: For part cost of needed equipment, laboratory supplies, apparatus, and repair of laboratories and buildings, $7,000;

"For material and apparatus for chemical, physical, and natural-history studies and use in laboratories of the new science hall, including cases and shelving, $2,000;

"For fuel and light: For part payment for fuel and light, Freedmen's Hospital and Howard University, including necessary labor to care for and operate the same, $3,500;

"In all, $101,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments excepting Senate amendment No. 68, and send it to conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman wants first to dispose of this particular amendment before he asks for a conference.

The SPEAKER. This action can be taken only by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the House by unanimous consent disagrees to all of the other Senate amendments excepting 68, then I shall move to concur in Senate amendment 68.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair stated. The gentleman furthermore asks unanimous consent that this Senate amendment 68 be voted on separately. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in Senate amendment 68.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the motion to concur, of course, takes precedence over a motion to disagree?

The SPEAKER. It does. The question is on concurring in Senate amendment 68.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on concurring in Senate amendment No. 68.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 86, answered "present" 1, not voting 136, as follows:

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER. Has a motion been made to send this to conference? I wanted to object if unanimous consent was asked.

The SPEAKER. It is too late; it was sent to conference three-quarters of an hour ago. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 21161. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21491.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21491, the fortifications bill, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21491) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, we are living in the most unusual period of the world's history. Preconceived notions have been swept away by the occurrence of a world war that in magnitude and in consequence is without parallel; and in the face of that condition it is but natural that men should reconsider their conclusions touching civilization, touching the duty of nations, and particularly touching the preparation that nations should make for and against war.

I believe it is distinctly true that the American people pursue peace as a passion. They have no aims that run athwart the legitimate purposes of any other nation. They have no desires that should necessarily bring them into conflict with other nations, and we are so fortunately situated geographically that it is difficult for us to even appreciate the pressure that has been upon other nations and the need for great armament that they have had to face. Situated as we are, we are unable to fairly judge the motives and fairly to determine the rightfulness of conduct of other nations because of our inability to place ourselves in their position. I believe that it is the peculiar destiny of this Nation to play the rôle of the peace advocate of the world. I know that it does not desire to compel what it can not invite; I do not believe that it will ever seek to enforce its will upon other nations in matters that relate to those nations and not to this country. But just to the extent that it is unwilling to drive, so to that degree is it determined not to be driven. And, in my judgment, no policy that undertook to prevent America from being in a position to sustain her view about those matters that peculiarly relate to her will ever be upheld by the people of America.

I cherish no delusions in this world of cruel fact. I wish it were true that we were approaching an era of universal peace. I wish it were possible that we might look to a period when disarmament would take place and when war and preparation for war would be relegated to the rear and nations or men that advocated them would be considered barbarians and be in such minority as to be ignored.

But prior to the breaking out of this war I had no belief as to the impossibility of future wars, and I have no belief now as to the impossibility of them. When the question of fortifying the Panama Canal was up before this House I took occasion then to call attention to the fact that neutrality would never protect a nation when the stake at issue was sufficient to warrant a stronger nation in disregarding that neutrality. I called attention to the fact that Belgium had preserved her neutrality during the Franco-Prussian War not by virtue of treaty obligation but by virtue of the army that she had upon the frontier; that Switzerland preserved her neutrality by virtue of the citizen soldiery that she could call to arms. I called attention to the violation of the neutrality of Korea, and the fact that no nation afterwards had undertaken to have the old condition restored or the nation punished that had been responsible for the violation of that neutrality. And certainly in the light of existing events that man must indeed be blind to actualities to delude himself that we can rest secure in the belief that because war ought not to be, therefore it will not be. Believing, then, as I do, that there is always the possibility of war, and at times probability of war, I naturally find myself faced with the question of what this Nation should do to prepare, not for war, but, as has well been said, against war, that we might make any nation hesitate before it engaged us in war, and if at last it came to an arbitrament of the sword we might be in a position to give a proper account of ourselves. I recognize that no problem is more difficult of solution and that no question is presented about which it is so difficult to keep one's poise and one's judgment. And I know of no time when there is more need for sober thought than there is to-day. We have had presented here frequently, as we have it presented in the country, two extreme views touching this matter, both, to my mind, equally wrong.

The extreme peace advocates who would have you disband your Army and your Navy and rely upon paper agreements are men who so completely refuse to recognize facts as they are that they think, because a few gentlemen sit around a table and bring their minds into accord touching some national or international matter, that thereby they have brought great nations into accord. And yet the history of the world is replete with instances of how futile such an attempt is. Friendship in the deep sense that it will overlook and disregard material direct national interest does not exist among nations and never has existed among nations. Now, no man regrets that more than I; but, I again repeat, I am compelled to face the world as I find it. On the other hand, there are men disregarding the situation in regard to our country, disregarding the peculiar advantages that we have geographically, disregarding the advantages that we have of wealth and of numbers, who think that any preparation that is not exactly equal to that made by the greatest military powers in the world is totally inadequate and a waste of money. That extreme is, to my mind, just as wrong as the other. And I do not believe that this country ever will undertake to establish an Army equal to that which Germany has had and France and the other great military powers have had; and, on the ocean, a Navy such as that which England possesses. A democracy never can and never will give that direction and control to military affairs that is possible in a monarchy. That single direction which is possible under that form of government never will be possible under our form of government and never should be. [Applause.]

But the great mass of the people of America, with that common sense that has ever distinguished them, occupy, in my judgment, a middle ground. They do not desire such a great Navy that they can compel submission to their viewpoint no matter whether it be just or unjust. They do not propose such a great Army as to sap the vitality of the Nation or to put an undue financial burden upon it. But they do believe in an efficient Navy; they do believe in proper defense; and in an Army that is capable of expansion and which could be successfully used in case of an invasion of this country.

The great mass of Americans do not contemplate that it will ever need an Army of any great size for the purpose of invading some other country. They will never agree to a policy that would be a temptation to us to disregard our rôle of a peaceful friend of the world and turn into that of an aggressor—one who sought to secure by might what it could not invite by justice.

I have said these things that I might make a proper background for what I shall say touching the pending bill. The fortification bill is a small one in volume, as bills of this Congress go. It usually carries a sum between $4,000,000 and $10,000,000, and it has been within that range for many, many years past. But while it is a bill small in volume it is a bill that of necessity involves the entire question of our military policy. In its consideration it necessarily requires a review of what America desires to do and what it is doing in all branches of military preparedness, for the bill not only deals with the fortifications for our coast defense and for our insular possessions, but it carries items relating to the mobile Army—items relating to its artillery and ammunition.

And that in turn involves a consideration of the size of such an Army, the purposes for which it is used, and a consideration of the Navy—its strength and ability to meet hostile fleets—and in fact every problem connected with military science.

How well the subcommittee on fortifications have performed their task in presenting to you the current bill is for this committee to judge. That it has worked diligently it is but fair that I should say. When you come to the technique of modern armament you enter a realm of exceeding difficulty. Men spend their lifetime in arriving at conclusions touching the merit and demerit of particular kinds of armaments, of different guns—their caliber—of the effectiveness of certain projectiles; and yet upon this floor, with the casual study of men suddenly awakened to the realization that there are such bills as the Army bill and the Navy bill and the fortification bill, we have dogmatic statements of certainty as to what should and should not be done, and extreme criticism of those who may not find themselves able to agree in entirety with the views thus vehemently suggested.

Every responsible legislator is confronted not simply with the desirability of doing a particular thing but with the desirability of doing a particular thing having in view the need to do other desirable things. In other words, he must consider not simply the merit of a given proposal but its relative merit, and he must consider not merely the particular bill that he has under consideration but also its relationship to the total expense of the Nation, the income of the Nation, and the burden of tax that will be laid by reason of any increase of expenditure.

Now, I am not one of those who believe that a plain duty in regard to national defense should be neglected because of financial considerations. I recognize that the highest duty of a nation is to prepare itself to continue as a nation. No duty can surpass that which is imposed on us properly to prepare this Nation for its continuance as a nation, and no excuse purely of money ought to have conclusive weight. But this also is true, that in considering what is to be done you must consider the risk that you propose to insure against; or, to put it better, not the risk that you propose to insure against, because insurance looks simply to indemnity and not prevention, but the evil that you should endeavor to prevent occurring. A man may have a number of buildings; they are not built of fireproof construction. It may be highly desirable to have them all of fireproof construction. But in determining whether he will go to the cost of remodeling those buildings or destroying them and erecting others, he has in mind the risk of fire, and the probability is that he will find himself unable, with a due regard to the business itself and its expansion, to make all the changes that he would like in order to prevent the possibility of fire; and so he will gradually alter and change in order to have his business as little as possible subject to risk.

And so it comes with us. It is not practicable at any one time in any one year to do everything that anyone may suggest as being necessary or desirable to prepare us fully for an emergency if it should happen to-morrow. Men properly consider the probability of such an emergency. This Nation properly considers whether there is an immediate danger or not; and having that in mind, it may go at a slower pace than it would if conditions confronting it made war immediately imminent.

As I took occasion to say last year in connection with the amounts appropriated for the mobile artillery and the ammunition therefor, if we were to have war within a year, I called attention to the fact that the appropriation was not adequate; that it not only ought to be what had been asked, but that it ought to be many many times that; that if we were no to have war in 10 or 15 years it was adequate, and perhaps we were progressing more rapidly than some might consider necessary.

Now, these are not easy questions to determine. It is very easy for gentlemen to criticize. It is very easy for gentlemen who do nothing to hold down expenditures of the Government, and who pay no attention to the bills touching the national defense until the matter becomes exceedingly popular with the public outside, to criticize the judgment of those who have conscientiously undertaken to perform their allotted tasks, and who have worked at a very difficult task with industry, whether they have worked at it with wisdom or not.

Now, I desire, in speaking of the present bill, to notice some of the criticisms that have been made touching the bill as it comes before you. First, let me say to you that the estimates this year total $6,193,642.32, and of that amount we have recommended $6,060,216.90, or a difference, in round numbers, of $133,000, $50,000 of which is represented in the nonallowance of an item for building a wharf at Outer Brewster Island, just outside of Boston. The others represent mostly items touching maintenance matters, where we did not believe there was any need to give the full sum asked.

Criticism is not made of the amounts that we carry, as they relate to the estimates submitted, because criticism could not be laid there. We so nearly approach the estimates that there was very little to be said. But criticism is made because we have not exceeded the estimates, and I shall deal with that matter in a few moments, trying to present what was the committee's viewpoint as to its duty in that regard.

First, let me speak of the hearings. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] took the committee to task yesterday because it had not examined the young officers. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] criticizes the committee because they did not summon an officer so old that he has been retired for age.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. How long ago was he retired for age?

Mr. SHERLEY. He was retired some time in November, I think. So that the question of age does not seem to be a controlling factor in determining the desirability of witnesses. What does seem to be controlling is the viewpoint of the witnesses, as they agree or do not agree with the particular gentlemen who ask that they be summoned and that their judgment be controlling upon the committee.

Now, the committee had one of two courses before it. It could either look to the War Department, the responsible agency for the determination of the policy in the technical sense as to fortifications, or it could go out on its own hook and undertake to summon every individual officer whose views had not met with the concurrence of the boards that had finally passed upon his recommendations, and establish itself into a court of inquiry to weigh the particular merits of the viewpoints of particular Army officers touching the merits of technical matters.

At times I have been accused, and inferentially in this debate, of having some conceit; but my conceit has never gone so far as to make me believe that either I or the members of my committee were capable, within the limits of time placed upon us, to determine upon the merits of controversies between Army officers touching matters that require a life study even to appreciate the problems involved, let alone to intelligently solve them.

So the committee did what I believe it ought to have done. It sent word to the Secretary of War that it was going to have its hearings upon a given day, and asked the Secretary of War to send proper officers to present the various items contained in the bill. In due time there came the Chief of Coast Artillery. Manifestly he was a proper man to have, because he is the man who is directly responsible for the Coast Artillery and for its personnel. We then had the Chief of Ordnance, and it was manifestly proper that we should have him, because under him are manufactured the guns and their carriages and the ammunition. We then had for the Signal Corps Gen. Scriven, the head of that corps, make a statement as to matters that came under the Signal Corps. Then we had Col. Winslow, who was designated to represent the Engineers, touching the matters that came before him.

There was nothing unusual in this. The same course has been followed for years, and to my mind no other course could produce a satisfactory result.

It may be thought desirable at some time to have a special committee created to consider particular questions and to undertake to arrive at an independent judgment by hearing the conflicting views of men touching these matters. But to ask an Appropriations Committee in a short session, making up an annual bill, to undertake to hear everyone who happened to have a viewpoint touching the wisdom of doing a particular thing, would be asking too much; and if we did not hear everyone, we would be more subject to the indictment brought against us than we now are.

For instance, one of the particular charges brought against us is the fact that most of the guns in our seacoast fortifications, particularly those that have been mounted in recent years, are mounted upon disappearing-gun carriages; and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], speaking with that eloquence that always characterizes him—and he is a very attractive speaker—declared that he had talked to many junior officers, and that every one he had talked to told him that the use of the disappearing-gun carriage was a mistake, and that we ought not to have it, and that this committee should have gone into that matter. Now, the committee did go into it to a limited extent. The committee asked Gen. Weaver what his judgment was touching the disappearing-gun carriage, and we asked him what was the opinion of the junior officers generally, so as to get not only his viewpoint but to get the viewpoint of those officers, as we might arrive at it from his knowledge of it.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. How far may one of these junior officers express his views, as differing from one of his senior officers? If any junior or inferior officer criticized any particular line of procedure of his superior officer, would he not be liable to discipline or penalties for insubordination?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is my understanding that he not only has liberty to express his viewpoint touching the desirability of any sort of armament, but under the rules it is made his express duty to bring to the attention of his superior officers anything that he considers should be brought to their attention touching the value or lack of value of ordnance.

Mr. HELM. It is his duty, as I understand my colleague, to bring it to the attention of his senior officer; but he can not, on his own initiative, for instance, appear before your committee and take a course which is at variance with the prescribed policy of procedure of the senior officer——

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a moment, now. He could not appear before my committee, and manifestly he ought not. You would have confusion worse confounded if you had hearings conducted by having voluntary witnesses express their views on all manner of technical subjects. Of necessity this Congress can not turn itself into a board of referees on the value of a particular kind of ordnance or upon the science of warfare. There is no more technical subject on earth. I have spent six years of hard work upon the fortifications bill. I have put upon it more work than upon all my other duties as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. At the end of six years I feel that I know only enough to appreciate how much I do not know about the subject matter, and I am very much less sure of my judgment touching these matters than I was when I had studied them for a month or two in the beginning of my service on the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Did the gentleman mean Gen. Weaver when he said Gen. Weaver discussed the efficiency of the Crozier disappearing carriage?

Mr. SHERLEY. I meant that Gen. Weaver expressed an opinion on that, and expressed an opinion touching the view held by the men in the Artillery Corps.

Mr. GARDNER. As it appears in the hearings, the discussion is with Col. Winslow and Gen. Crozier, mostly, is it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am afraid the gentleman has overlooked that part of Gen. Weaver's tertimony. I reread it last night, and I think I may be able to turn to it in a moment.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask the gentleman for information, because I have not been able to find that part of the hearing. It does not appear in the index.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be. I am quite sure my statement is accurate, and I am making it from notes that I have here. It is found on page 69 of the 1916 hearings, and I will insert it in my printed speech. This is the testimony:

Mr. SHERLEY. General, we use now in all ot our more modern fortifications a disappearing gun carriage, usually spoken of as the Crozier-Buffington gun carriage, and we have some barbette carriages?

Gen. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is your judgment as to the adequacy and desirability of the disappearing gun carriage?

Gen. WEAVER. I have always been strongly in favor of it. It has advantages which I believe the nondisappearing carriage does not have. It has especially the advantage of concealment; the enemy can not see the gun, and therefore there is no ranging point on which it can direct its fire; another advantage is, there is a saving of time in loading it, because the gun comes down to the ammunition on the loading platform instead of having to bring the ammunition from the loading platform up to the height of the gun. The accuracy of fire is equal, and I can not see, and never have been able to see, anything to offset these advantages it has over the nondisappearing gun carriage.

Mr. SHERLEY. As far as you know, the view you have expressed is shared by Artillery officers?

Gen. WEAVER. Like any question of that kind, I think you will find a diversity of opinion; but I think a majority of our officers share the views I have expressed.

Mr. SHERLEY. These gun carriages have now been in actual use in the United States for quite a number of years?

Gen. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you find any real difficulty in operating them or any defect in their construction or nature such as to interfere in any material way with the accuracy or rapidity of our gunfire?

Gen. WEAVER. No. Nothing material affecting the disappearing principle.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The gentleman was about to give the opinion of the junior officers on the question of the disappearing gun carriage when he was interrupted by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I simply stated that Gen. Weaver said that in his judgment—I do not want to quote his exact language, because it is not in front of me, but the substance of it was that there was no large minority that differed as to the efficiency of the Crozier-Buffington disappearing gun.

Now, statements were made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that I am sure he thought were accurate but which, according to my information, are at total variance with the facts. The gun mounted on a disappearing gun carriage is capable of more rapid fire than that upon a barbette carriage, and it is claimed—I want to be fair—by those who favor a barbette carriage that it is possible by modernizing such carriage to arrange for a mechanical lift from the platform to the breach of the gun, so as to increase the rapidity of fire and bring it up to that obtained by the disappearing gun carriage.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. The difference between a disappearing gun carriage and a barbette in regard to the rapidity of fire lies chiefly in this: That after the ammunition is raised by an electric hoist to the gun floor the disappearing gun on its recoil is brought down so that the breech is on a level with the ammunition, which is in trays and which can be shoved immediately into the breech of the gun without the need of an additional lift, whereas on the barbette carriages as they have had them heretofore, there would have to be a lift from the gun platform up to the breech of the gun on the barbette carriage. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not a fact that other nations have had a rearranging of the hoist of ammunition to serve guns on the barbette carriage, so that they are more rapid than our disappearing gun carriages to-day?

Mr. SHERLEY. I should say yes to half the question and no to the other half. I think they have made arrangements for mechanical lifts of the ammunition. I have no information, but I question the accuracy of the statement that thereby they have been able to increase the rapidity of the gunfire over that of ours mounted on disappearing gun carriages.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit, allow me to say that they have arranged a mechanical elevation of ammunition, so as to permit the firing of the gun as rapidly as the ammunition can be put in, and it saves the time that it takes for the disappearing gun to move back and then forward again to its place.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hold in my hand a number of reports which are available where there has been an investigation of the efficiency and desirability of disappearing gun carriages. This is not a new controversy. It is a controversy that probably will never be ended. Individual men will hold individual views, but the question has been repeatedly passed upon by boards created for that express purpose. I submit to you gentlemen in common fairness, whether you think our committee would have been warranted in undertaking to pass judgment upon the advisability of using such gun carriages, and whether we would have been warranted in refusing to allow appropriations because some of them went for the manufacture of disappearfng gun carriages.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman give us the date of the reports to which he has reference?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the most recent report has been something over 10 years.

Mr. GARDNER. In the Fifty-seventh Congress, was it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think there is one later than that. It might have been the Fifty-seventh Congress. There was a report that was not contained in any Senate document that I know of but can be found in the appendix to a report of the Chief of Ordnance of a later date than that. Perhaps the reason why there has not been a later investigation is on account of the satisfactory service that the gun carriages have given. However, I again submit to this committee as intelligent men whether or not the Committee on Fortifications would have been warranted in going into a subject upon which the committee could not come to an intelligent conclusion, and which would have meant weeks of inquiry.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Was there any testimony before the committee as to whether or not the disappearing-gun carriages in any way affected the accuracy of fire?

Mr. SHERLEY. The testimony was that it did not affect the accuracy of fire, and others have testified to the fact that there was an improvement in the accuracy of fire. There was also testimony as to the rapidity with which gunfire could be had.

Now, there was a statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that the 12-inch guns were not fired at the highest velocity because of the fear that the gun carriage would not be sufficient. The answer to that is that they have been fired at the higher velocity, and the reduction from the higher velocity to the lower velocity was due to the desire to prevent such rapid erosion of the rifling of the gun and thus prolong the life of the gun. It is also to be borne in mind that when gentlemen tell you of the tremendous velocity of projectiles fired from an English or an American naval gun they will find from careful examination that instead of the velocity having increased it has recently decreased, and that some of the older guns on the English battleships and upon the American battleships were fired at a higher velocity and had a longer range than some of the most modern guns now about to be mounted on the English ships or those mounted on the recent American ships.

Mr. MILLER. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman if he wants to proceed, but will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman deny the accuracy of the statement that the English guns to-day—the 12-inch caliber guns—are firing a projectile weighing 3,000 pounds while ours fires one weighing 2,250 pounds?

Mr. SHERLEY. I made the statement that the velocity of the projectile fired from some of the earlier English guns was greater than that from some of the modern guns, and in proof of that I call attention to the table found on page 206 of the current hearings.

This table shows that the 12-inch British 50-caliber gun fires a projectile weighing 850 pounds with a muzzle velocity of 3,010 foot-seconds, and it had a range of 24,870 yards; that the 15-inch 45-caliber gun fires a projectile of 1,950 pounds at a muzzle velocity of 2,500 foot-seconds, with a maximum range of 21,193 yards. And I repeat, Mr. Chairman, what I said before, that an examination into the matter will show that some of the earlier type of guns upon both British and American battleships were fired with greater velocity than the modern guns, and with a greater range than some of the modern guns.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman mean a greater range at the same elevation, or was it at an elevation of 45°?

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean at an elevation of 15°. I did not read the 45° elevations, and in that connection the gentleman's inquiry reminds me of a part of his remarks yesterday when he discussed the question of the alteration of the 12-inch guns. He said they proposed to shoot up in the air, and he gave the impression to this House that there was something extremely novel; that they were practically trying to make mortars out of those guns; that they were to be fired up in the air, and yet the very elevation that was used in order to get the range that the gentleman spoke of in connection with the English guns was that same elevation of 15°. If it is shooting up in the air in one instance, it is shooting up in the air in the other.

Mr. GARDNER. One being a direct-fire gun.

Mr. SHERLEY. Both being direct-fire guns. A 12-inch gun shooting at 15° elevation is as much a direct-fire gun as a 15-inch gun shooting at 15° elevation.

Mr. GARDNER. That would depend on the range; but the gentleman was saying that the British guns, old model, had a greater muzzle velocity. Is not the striking power arrived at by multiplying the mass by the square of the velocity?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And has not the weight of the projectile gone up from 850 pounds to 1,950 pounds, and is it not just as well to consider that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly; and I have never for a moment said that you should not consider it. I was dealing with the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], that the reason we had not fired guns mounted on disappearing carriages at an increased velocity was because of the fear of the carriage. That is not, in my judgment, an accurate statement.

Mr. GARDNER. Would not the gentleman think it proper to have some officers before his committee who thought it was an accurate statement, so as to hear their testimony?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; and I answer the gentleman again, no—not because I desire not to avail myself of any sort of information that I can get, but because I realize a limitation upon myself, even if the gentleman does not realize one upon himself. I do not believe that either myself or the members of my committee, within the time limit possible, could go into these questions to determine their value, and I do not think our determination after we had gone into the matter would be as good as that of the constituted authorities. The gentleman and I differ in this fundamental particular. He seems to think that anybody who happens now to be at the head of the Army is disqualified for judgment; that those at the top are mossbacked and have become antiquated; that their views are of no value; and that in order to arrive at anything worth while you must listen to all of the younger officers, whereas I believe that the only possible way by which you can have real order and a really efficient Army is by having matters of technique come up in the regular channels and be determined upon by boards constituted of men who presumably have the training and the knowledge to make their judgment worth while.

For this Congress to undertake to take the place of boards in the War Department by passing upon technical matters would be to have bedlam turned loose. Let me say another thing to the gentleman. It is perfectly apparent to every man who has talked with officers in both branches of the service that whenever you get hold of a particular man who has had a theory of his, which may or may not be good, turned down, of course he tells you about the dreadful consequences of rejecting his viewpoint. I am not blaming these men for their zeal, but I do say that in common-sense dealing we have to look at the thing in a practical way, and that the committee could not have determined the question of the value of the disappearing gun carriage.

Mr. GARDNER rose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to go on to some other matters, but I yield for a question.

Mr. GARDNER. I was going to ask if the gentleman felt this House was incapable of voting on the question of the Isham shell or submarines, because that is exactly the issue that has been presented? That was done over the protest of the Navy Department.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think the opinion of this House as to the value of the Isham shell amounts to very much.

Mr. GARDNER. No; but take the submarines and the original adoption of the plan for submarines. Was the judgment of the House right or that of the bureau chiefs?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would have to know their particular judgment and the judgment of the bureau chiefs to answer that question categorically. This of course is true: There are some matters of policy that the Congress can determine, but they are very rare as to technical matters, and my judgment of the function of the Congress is to determine the broad policy of the size of the Army that you propose to have and the size of the Navy that you propose to have, the basic question of a military policy; but that when it undertakes to qualify as competent to determine the technical questions involved in a science as intricate as that of war, then it is undertaking to do what very few sensible men would do in outside life. If I go to a physician and I am ill and he diagnoses my case and says that I have appendicitis, I am not going to put my judgment up against his and say that I do not think I have. If I am not satisfied with his judgment I may go to a new physician, but I at least am not going to qualify as an expert in anatomy.

Mr. GARDNER. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman says that he thinks the proper thing to do is to have the head of the Army before him; that the heads of the Army are not disqualified merely because they disagree with some casual people like myself.

I asked the gentleman to summon the most recent head of the Army, the only head of the Army available, the recent Chief of Staff who went out of office in November——

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I must control my own time, and I will answer the gentleman's question. Why did not we do that? The committee did not summon Gen. Wotherspoon. Why? It did not summon him because he is now not an officer in the service. He is retired, and was not at the time the hearings were had the Chief of Staff. He was Chief of Staff for eight months. I do not desire to do the general an injustice. If I desired, I might say that the positiveness of his views touching matters connected with the Army became evident only when he was leaving the service; but that is aside from the question. We did not believe that it was proper to go out and get an ex-member of the service, especially as we had his viewpoint recently expressed. Now, a good deal was said about his viewpoint having been the result of the experience of the European war. His report was submitted, I think, November 22. The war broke out in August. The amount of valuable information—and I use the word "valuable" properly—the amount of valuable information that was obtained by him or any other Army officer as to the result of the European war touching these technical matters was negligible, and so is the amount of information they now have, and I will tell you why. For instance, you take the question much exploited in the Army bill, and about which the gentleman from Massachusetts had so much to say, the relative proportion of field guns to rifles and sabers in the mobile army.

The Greble Board, acting fully on that matter, fixed 3.16 per thousand rifles and sabers. Gen. Wotherspoon figured it out at 5 per thousand. Now, as to the information we have touching the European war. The general opinion is that artillery is playing a very big part in that war. There is no practical information as to the number of rounds that are being fired from a given battery in a given length of time, and if we had it it would not be of sufficient value to anyone to draw conclusions. Why so? Because you have not only to determine how fast they are using the ammunition, but how wisely they are using it, and in order to determine how wisely you would have to have the report of an observer at the other side to see the effect of that ammunition and whether it was being wasted or not. But I desire to go ahead. I have been severely criticized because of a reputed statement that I am supposed to have made to the effect that we were not only well fortified but perhaps the best fortified country in the world. Let me say in advance that the way to judge a man's viewpoint is not to take a sentence, but to take all that he says on a given proposition. I made no speech in this House and I have made no speech in public in which I have not always pointed out, along with the good things that we have, the bad things, where I thought we were deficient, and what I thought was needed in order to help better those conditions. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts did me the honor to call upon an expert, as he says, to pass judgment upon the reputed interview of mine in the Star of November 28. So far as that day was concerned, I was on the high seas. It being my birthday, I remember where I was. The interview was reputed to have come as a result of a speech I had made in the House.

Mr. GARDNER. I do not think the gentleman wishes to do me an injustice.

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. GARDNER. I do not think I ever said it was an interview; but the article speaks for itself.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right, I will withdraw the word "interview"; but let us not waste time with nonessentials.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman acknowledges he was mistaken, does he?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have here what the gentleman said.

Mr. GARDNER. The interview is here and speaks for itself. I have it here. "SHERLEY is picked to meet charges"——

Mr. SHERLEY. That article! I know nothing about those headlines. What I was quoting from is this:

The article is headed: "Views of experts on United States defenses, Representative SHERLEY among others who expressed themselves satisfied with equipment." Then the article opens as follows:

"The continental United States is not only well fortified, but is perhaps better fortified than any country in the world, said Representative SHERLEY, of Kentucky, in presenting to the House the annual bill for the fortifications of the important and strategic harbors of the country at the session just closed."

Mr. GARDNER. Last year.

Mr. SHERLEY. In that speech the gentleman will find I made a statement touching the matters that he has spoken of.

Mr. GARDNER. I want the gentleman to admit that he was not correctly stating it when he said——

Mr. SHERLEY. All right; let us not deal with nonessentials.

Mr. GARDNER. I think it is very essential.

Mr. SHERLEY. He quotes Mr. Huidekoper, whom he asked to write an article. Mr. Huidekoper is a very estimable gentleman in private life who has spent a good deal of time in writing articles on military subjects. As to the value of them, I have no opinion to express; but he undertakes to compare our fortifications with Germany, and particularly in regard to the fortifications at Heligoland.

I simply wish to say in regard to that, that if he has any information in regard to those fortifications he will find the most receptive crowd at the War Department he ever saw, because they have no information, have never been able to obtain any, and, so far as I know, no one is in possession of accurate information touching German fortifications. Then he goes ahead in a discussion of the land fortifications of Germany and states that we have no land fortifications, and therefore we can not be said to be as well fortified. Of course, we have no land fortifications, and it has been no part of the scheme that we should have land fortifications, speaking broadly. We do not fortify the frontier of Canada, because there is no need, owing to our splendid relations with Canada. We do not fortify the frontier of Mexico, because the strength of Mexico is not sufficient to make it necessary, and parallels that are undertaken to be drawn between interior fortifications and frontier fortifications of European countries, who are confronted with other countries of equal strength and where the feeling is always more or less strained, and our coast defenses have no direct value.

Now, our fortifications are intended for certain purposes—and I speak now of continental United States—and it is well to bear in mind what those purposes are. They are not intended, and never were intended, to prevent the landing on our shores of a hostile army. It is not within the realm of financial possibility to so fortify the coast lines of the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf, as to bring that about. I have never known any serious man, having in mind the cost, who ever proposed anything of that kind. The purpose of our fortifications is to protect a particular harbor or to protect a particular city, and they have served this purpose, according to the view of those that planned the defenses, when they force an enemy to land in order to effect their capture.

Now, these fortifications are open in the rear. Much might be said in favor of certain places having some batteries that would be a defense against land attack. Something might be said in favor of having an all-around fire for some guns.

In the case of the mortars that is usual. But I want you to keep in mind that the defense of these fortifications from the rear is looked upon as a mobile-army proposition and not as a fortification proposition. Everyone who has been a student of the subject knows that.

Now, I have repeatedly said that in my judgment our fortifications would not be put to the test of their sufficiency, because an enemy having control of the sea, which is a prerequisite of any attempt of a landing party of any size, other than one making a sortie, would never undertake to subdue such fortifications, but, instead, would go outside of the range of the guns, effect a landing, and, if necessary to capture them, would undertake their capture from the rear. Now, if they are weak in that particular, the remedy lies, and must lie in large measure, with the mobile army, and there is where we are weak and need improvement.

The gentleman from Massachusetts stated, as if it were a matter of great concern, that there was not even a barbed-wire entanglement in the rear of these fortifications. There is not, and I can not imagine anything more foolish than a barbed-wire entanglement there now; but the gentleman is probably aware that plans have been worked out and are being worked out for the land defense of every one of these fortifications, and it is hoped that these palns will go to such a degree of refinement that there will be for each district officer, in the case of the breaking out of hostilities, such plans and specifications and blue prints as will enable him to go and hire certain labor to do a particular piece of work at a particular point, without the need of any other information than that which upon the opening of an envelope will be available to him.

Mr. GARDNER. Substantially I agree with what the gentleman has just been saying; but there is another thing. Are not harbor or coast fortifications for this purpose as well, namely, are they not to prevent the bombardment——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman had waited I would have come to that, and I will speak of it right now. I said they were for the protection of a harbor or for the protection of a city. They are a protection for a harbor for two reasons. One is to enable that harbor to be used as a rendezvous for our own fleet, and the other is to prevent its use as a rendezvous for the enemy's fleet and as a base of supplies for a landing party, and as such protection to enable our fleet to be used offensively and not simply on the defense. They are supposed to be a protection for some cities against bombardment.

Now, I want to be perfectly frank in that. The gentlemen who will read my speech of last year with candor will find that there I called attention to the fact that I thought it might be necessary to put additional armament at certain fortifications, due to two things—the increased range of guns upon foreign ships and the growth of cities into outlaying territory that was not occupied at the time the fortifications were planned and erected. It has been just a bit amusing to find myself classed as one of those constantly opposing advancement. I am in favor of heavy armament. I have never thought that a 12-inch gun was equal to a modern 14 or a 15-inch gun, and I have never known of any human being who did. Certainly Gen. Crozier, who is constantly held up as the embodiment of everything that is antiquated, never held any such view. And, in passing, may I say that while Gen. Crozier has his viewpoints, and some of them may or may not be correct, I would that the Army had many men of his industry, of his intelligence, and of his courage. [Applause.] He is a distinct ornament to the service that he has given his life to.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield. I want to agree with him as to Gen. Crozier, and I will add, "his integrity."

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not mention that, because that does not need to be spoken of as to Gen. Crozier.

Now, I made the statement that we were well fortified, and probably the best fortified country on the earth. I made it with the qualifications which I gave—qualifications as to the amount of ammunition—which I shall not be able to touch on now, but I will under the 5-minute rule; made it with statements as to what we lacked in regard to searchlights, as to what we lacked in regard to fire control, as to what we lacked in many other particulars. And why did I make it—simply as my judgment? No. My judgment is of very little value in this matter. But I made that on the statement of officers who ought to know.

The most aggressive, the most persistent, officer who was ever Chief of Staff, in my memory, was Gen. Leonard Wood. Whatever may be his merits or demerits, he was a man who had the courage of his convictions and who never lost an opportunity to express those views and to urge them upon Congress. He was before my committee; and not only before my committee, but I have talked with him many times. And I want to say a thing now, too, namely, that when he was Chief of Staff, in making up the fortification bill, when it became necessary to bring the bill within a certain size financially, I consulted with him as to the items which should be eliminated, assuming that some had to be eliminated, and those bills were made up in detail with his concurrence and his knowledge. He urged upon us the doing of certain things as being things of most importance, and the committee followed his judgment in that, and I think it was wise in following his judgment in that. It was not able to do everything, but it did the things as best it could that were urged as being most necessary.

Now, Gen. Wood has testified as to the value of fortifications. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] undertakes to break the force of his testimony by saying that he submitted a list at the same time he made the statement of additions to armaments that were needed. He did. He simply took a list of what had been reported in the old Taft Board, but it was a list that he has never urged upon us and never has submitted an estimate for.

And while I think some of them are needed, that list was not submitted with the idea of qualifying his statement that he thought we were well fortified. I say another thing, that if you were to get a consensus of opinion of the Army and Navy men of America they would tell you there is less reason to be alarmed over the condition of our fortifications than over any other matter. They will tell you that your trouble in regard to your Army is not half so much in the matériel as it is in men. They will tell you that the need is more for men than it is for the matériel that the men are to use. They will tell you that the trouble is not with our fortifications; the trouble is elsewhere.

All things are relative in this life, and we can not do all at once, even though we may wish to. I know of no period during the 12 years in which I have served in this House when I have not been willing to go faster than I believed Congress was willing to go in regard to Army and Navy matters. But I have tried to adjust myself somewhat to an environment. I have tried to be practical; and if the committee has erred, it has erred as the result of an honest effort and a consistent effort that has not simply been manifested when it became popular to talk about this subject matter.

Now, I will try and get Gen. Wood's statement into the RECORD. If I do not read it, I will put it in the RECORD. It is found on page 18 of the hearings for 1915. Gen. Wood was asked there——

Mr. GARDNER. What year was that? I did not get the year.

Mr. SHERLEY. The year 1915. I asked him touching the estimates. I read:

General, your estimates this year are about $9,000,000, as against approximately $7,000,000 estimated last year, and against an appropriation last year of $5,000,000. The large increases are those for the mobile artillery and for ammunition?

Gen. WOOD. Yes, sir; in fact, all of it, or the bulk of it, is due to that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, there has been stated each year heretofore the opinion of the department as to the relative importance of the various items that are submitted in this bill. Would you make a statement to the committee now as to what you consider the most important matters to be provided?

Gen. WOOD. I should say ammunition above all things.

He is there speaking of ammunition for the mobile artillery. He asked:

Do you mean under this particular subject?

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean particularly the bill as a whole.

Gen. WOOD. I should say that the most important things dealt with by this bill are, first, ammunition for Field Artillery; second, guns for the Field Artillery; third, the completion of the work in the Hawaiian Islands; and fourth, the coast defenses and fortifications work in the Philippines. That is very largely completed.

Mr. SHERLEY. And after those things you have enumerated would come matters relating to continental United States?

Gen. WOOD. Yes, sir. Except with reference to the work at San Diego and the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay we are very well taken care of here.

Now, in the 1914 hearings his statement was more pronounced than that. On page 13 I read:

Mr. SHERLEY. It has been testified heretofore that so far as the continental United States was concerned we were not only adequately fortified, but in many instances overfortified.

Gen. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. And you concur in that general proposition?

Gen. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. In your judgment would it ever be necessary, as to the large proportion of fortified places, to make any change in the armament that has been provided?

Gen. WOOD. No, sir; except possibly in the type of mortar carriages and some other minor changes which might involve the placing, possibly at an advanced point, a battery or two of a heavier type of gun, but essentially the present armaments will remain intact so far as we can see.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is, then, the opinion of the War Department now that, with the exception of the possible need of increasing the armament at San Diego and providing for the armament now authorized at San Pedro and Cape Henry, the coast of the continental United States is adequately fortified?

Gen. WOOD. The Taft Board project, which Congress approved, still remains. Some portion of it we do not think will ever need to be carried out. Other portions of it, we think, will need to be carried out, but, generally speaking, it can be said, with the exception of the places you have mentioned on the Pacific coast and the work at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, that the essential features of the coast defenses have been completed. Now, as was stated awhile ago about the coasts being overfortified, that is apparently true, or at least we so regard it now. We put in more guns than were perhaps absolutely necessary, and in that we exercised supercaution. However, there are certain things which still remain to be done, and, with your permission, I will insert a statement of them in the record.

The gentleman from Massachusetts read the rest of the lines.

Mr. GARDNER. What is the date of that evidence? What is the date when it was given?

Mr. SHERLEY. The date when it was given was December, 1912. I read what he said the next year. The gentleman from Massachusetts wants to produce the impression upon this House that there has been such a complete revolution in regard to the range of guns upon modern battleships within the last year or two that it has totally altered the conditions in regard to the fortifications. I deny it. I say it has modified it in some particulars, but it has not in any very substantial way. There were guns then, at the time those words were uttered, mounted with just as far a range as the guns that are now to be put on the Queen Elizabeth type of English battleships. There were American guns of just as far range as there are upon American battleships now mounting guns of 14-inch caliber.

I had the pleasure of dining out the other night with an officer of the Army and a distinguished naval officer, and in order that the Army officer's credibility may not be impugned I want to say that he was not one of those who have testified in this hearing. Both of them concurred in the general statement that the best evidence of a novice touching the science of war was his immediately asking as to the range of a gun, as if that was the all-important factor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman wish some more time?

Mr. SHERLEY. When the bill is read, after the first paragraph is read, I shall endeavor to speak, with the indulgence of the committee, for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to continue available until expended, namely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not delay the committee but a little longer, but there are one or two things that I think I ought now to say, and I can then amplify them a little later on. One of the things I want to call your attention to is this, that there is a very great advantage with a fortification in a battle with a fleet, and the advantage is very easily recognized. In the first place, the fort shoots at a plainly visible target that is vulnerable. In the second place, it shoots with the advantage of a long base line in connection with its range finding. You gentlemen, of course, realize that firing is not done simply by sighting, but that the range of the object to be hit is determined by the principle of triangulation and the determining of the angles at the end of a long base line. Manifestly, the longer the line the less error will result in accurate range finding due to any error in your observation.

Not only is that true, but a ship in firing at a fortification fires always at an obscure target, and frequently at a hidden one. If any of you gentlemen have gone down the Potomac River and have undertaken to find or even had pointed out to you the fortifications on that river you will realize the difficulty of seeing them within ranges of 2 or 3 miles. Not only is that of advantage, but in order to do appreciable damage to the fortification you have either to hit the gun for the fraction of a minute—assuming that it is a disappearing gun—that it is over the rampart in firing or you have to hit on the inner crest of the fortification so as to cause damage either to the personnel or the gun, or you have got to have a shell explode at the particular moment that it is passing over these fortifications.

Now, all of these are a distinct advantage. I do not believe there is any danger of our fortifications being put out of business by an attack from a hostile fleet. In the first place, I do not believe a hostile fleet is going to attempt it. It is not going to waste ammunition by standing off and shooting at a range of 21,000 yards or anything like it, and if it has control of the sea it is not going to bother about the reduction of the fortification from the sea, anyway.

It is true that there might be danger of the bombardment of certain cities. Some danger is an incident to war and must be undergone. For instance, we have not fortified all the coast cities of the country, and we shall probably never try to do so. There are any number of cities that have no fortifications, and it would be possible for an enemy's fleet to bombard them if you assume a number of things. And, by the way, that is a good thing to bear in mind when gentlemen are getting the buck ague. Remember all of their premises are necessary before the catastrophe happens. They always lick our fleet first. They put our submarines out of business. They clear up the mines and make an open channel, and then, having won every stage of the fight and being left alone to choose their time and place, they proceed to demolish the fortifications and to land an army and capture the country. But, assuming their premises, it is possible that at certain cities they might be able, if they got in at a certain place where on the map there is indicated water enough to float them, to bombard part of a city and be out of range of our guns. It was my intention at this session to have gone into the condition of each unit in the fortifications of America. I think that ought to be done. I had hoped to do it at this session.

More than a year and a half ago, when there was no war scare, when it was not popular to dig into all these matters, I saw what I thought to be the wisdom of considering these subjects. I took the matter up with the Chief of the Coast Artillery. He went into some study of it. But this was the condition that confronted us this year. I would have had to take practically his single judgment as to what was necessary at these various places.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed until he concludes. I suppose that will not be very long.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to impose upon the committee. It is a big subject, and it is difficult to cover. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky be allowed to proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would have had to take from the general his statement as to what he thought was necessary, according to the judgment that he had from the reports of the local officers. Had I done that, I would have been subject to the very criticism that I think properly applies to the viewpoint of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and others who criticize the committee because they did not examine individual men. We have been working under what is known as the Taft Board report. The Taft Board was convened under an order by President Roosevelt, and it took as its basis the old Endicott report, the report of a board convened when Cleveland was President. The report of the Endicott Board had become in many ways obsolete. Rifled and more powerful cannon and smokeless powder and many other things had made the findings of that board no longer valuable.

The Taft Board undertook to modernize it and bring it up to date, and they made a report which is a very remarkable document—remarkable in its thoroughness, remarkable in the detail with which it went into questions. Now, in large measure we have been following that Taft report, as modified from time to time by boards that have considered these matters. Part of what the Taft Board have recommended is now thought to be unnecessary. Some things that they did not recommend are now plainly necessary. If I had undertaken to have Gen. Weaver report, I would then have had the report of a man for whom I have the highest respect and admiration; but that would have represented simply his viewpoint. Now, it might be that a great many other men would not agree with him at all. They would either think that additional armament was not needed or they would think that armament was needed in greater amount than he thought, or that it ought to be emplaced at one point instead of another. I do not believe we ought to spend great sums of money without careful consideration of what we are doing. I talked to the Secretary of War about the matter, and I am glad to say that he has created a board, which is to be a continuing board, which is not to go out of existence after the performing of a particular duty, but is to be a continuing board to consider just these questions. I have no doubt that next year the committee will be in a position to obtain not the viewpoint of a particular officer, but the final judgment of the War Department touching the needs of additional armament at particular places.

There was no condition confronting us so alarming as to make it necessary that we should disregard the ordinary prudent and sensible course and simply appropriate money out of fear, because gentlemen will bear in mind that even assuming that the present world affairs were such as to make war with us imminent, no sums that are carried in this bill will have any appreciable effect upon our situation should war come upon us; and if war should come, this Congress, like all previous Congresses, would immediately vote sums that would make any amount carried in this bill insignificant and negligible.

Then, too, armament is not built in a day. Now, it may be said, "Yes; but you lose a year," and it may be said, as it has been said, that we simply spend our days in considering and reporting and reconsidering. I do not believe that is altogether a fair indictment of the War Department. It is mighty easy for gentlemen to determine what ought to be done who are not charged with the responsibility and know nothing about the science that they undertake to criticize. Gentlemen, I usually find that the War Department is particularly alert to take advantage of new matters, and that we have gone to a degree of refinement in Coast Artillery that is probably not approached by any other nation. The refinement that we have gone to in regard to all of the supplements to our guns, in the way of fire control, in the way of many auxiliaries, is such as to make me think that these gentlemen are by no means asleep, but that they are very wide-awake.

And this all means money. There is always a question when we shall throw aside something which is not as good as the most modern, but which may still be of value. Men differ as to what should go to the scrap heap. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and I differ in this particular, that he would give the impression that because our guns are not of the greatest range and largest caliber for that reason they are negligible and can be disregarded. He may not have said just that, but that has been the whole tone and color of his criticism. I do not believe it. I believe that in many instances our fortifications have more guns than necessary, put there out of abundant caution. I repeat, that we are not in danger of having the fortifications put out of business. It may be necessary—I think it will be necessary—to put certain additional fortifications at points farther out in order to protect portions of cities from long-range bombardment. I hope that we will have an accurate report touching that matter next year, and I believe if we have it we will have action taken by Congress on it.

Some criticism has been made as to the fortification of Cape Henry. Cape Henry is an old story. Its fortification was recommended by the Endicott Board, and it was most strongly urged by the Taft Board. It was urged every year that I have been on that committee. I remember when my predecessor was chairman of that committee, Mr. Walter Smith, of Iowa, a man of great industry and very great, hard, common sense, he did not concur with the War Department about the need of fortifying Cape Henry and he would never give his consent, and the matter was thrashed out on the floor. I rather concurred in his view. I took a trip down there right after I got on the committee. As years went on and these men kept insisting on their viewpoint, I came to realize that I was not warranted in putting my judgment against the judgment of every Army and Navy officer that talked about the matter. It is true that we had been very much disturbed by the frequent views which the Army had as to what was necessary to fortify the mouth of the Chesapeake. Originally you were to have monitors anchored at the mouth. Then you were to build an artificial island. Japan went to building islands, and the habit became contagious, and for a while everybody was talking about islands upon which to place fortifications; and they are exceedingly valuable, for the very plain reason that they are not subject to capture by land assault.

Then they had a proposition to fortify Cape Henry and Cape Charles both, but finally the increased range of guns made them come to the conclusion that it was possible to fortify Cape Henry and have guns of sufficient caliber to reach across the channel and prevent a run by.

In that connection I want to say that the size of the armament that is to be had at a particular fortification does not measure the size of the armament needed at another fortification. All fortifications do not need the biggest guns. The armament necessary is determined by the topography and hydrography of the particular vicinity. At one place the fortification is to prevent a run by, and at another place it may be to protect a city, and they have to be adapted to each particular locality. It is a most technical matter and a matter about which men do not learn the last word in a few hours' study.

I finally came to the House with a report from my committee in favor of the fortification of Cape Henry. There had been some division in the committee on that matter. It was not easy to get the committee to come to an agreement about it, and when it came out on the floor the colleague of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GILLETT, made a speech against fortifications on Cape Henry, and advanced what many thought were good arguments as to why it should not be done, and he got quite a considerable following. But the House supported the recommendation of the committee and we determined to fortify it. There then came the question of the purchase of the land. It took time to get this land, and, to make a long story short, we finally got it and got it without paying an exorbitant price through condemnation proceedings.

Then there came the question of what armament should be put there. There had been a good deal of dispute about that; some gentlemen, one of whom is now being quoted as the chief apostle of heavy armament and a vast amount of mobile artillery, and others thought that 12-inch guns were sufficient, and there was a considerable difference of view in regard to it. Several years ago I stated my lay opinion for whatever it might be worth, that we ought to have 16-inch guns there. At that time there was no 16-inch gun mounted anywhere, or proposed to be mounted. My reason was that there was a particular object to be served by fortifying at Cape Henry, and that was to close the mouth of the entrance of the Chesapeake and prevent a run by, and to prevent the use of Lynnhaven Bay as a rendezvous for a hostile fleet, and thereby the landing of an army, repeating the happenings at the time Washington was burned in the War of 1812.

So that it is not to-day and it is not even yesterday that I saw the wisdom of heavy armament at particular places. But because you see the wisdom of heavy armament at particular places, because you see the desirability of doing it when you start on a new project, is no reason for condemning something that was done at an earlier period, of determining that because it is not the equal of what can now be done that it is totally inadequate. These are conclusions that do not follow, and they need only to be stated for one to see that they do not follow.

What was the situation in regard to Cape Henry at this time? There had not been such a final agreement in regard to Cape Henry at the time the estimates were made so as to enable the Secretary to submit estimates for this work to Congress. Since then I think there has been an agreement as to the armament that should be there, and that armament will have in its major batteries guns of 16 inches. In view of the demands that were made in other regards, not only in this bill but in other bills, and in view of the general condition of the Treasury, the Secretary of War did not feel warranted in submitting supplemental estimates that would have amounted to close to $2,000,000. The committee, in the absence of such estimates, did not feel warranted in recommending the appropriation. The work there will take about three years. When it is started it ought to be carried on just as rapidly as possible, and the thing that I have tried to insist upon is that when we enter on new projects we should carry along everything that goes with the project, so as to try and get a finished unit, and not have something that is part done here and part done there. It may be that the committee has erred in not bringing in that amount. That is for this Committee of the Whole to say. I do not believe that the Committee on Appropriations would have been warranted in disregarding what was recommended and going outside. I think it has performed its highest function when it gives what information it can to the Committee of the Whole and makes recommendations that represent its judgment within the estimates. The very moment you get to going outside of your estimates you will find that there will be constant pressure from all sorts of sources to do all sorts of things, many of which may prove to be very unwise, and there will be very great extravagance. In the House of Commons it is not in order to move to increase the estimates of the Government. I have never asked that the judgment of the Appropriations Committee should be the judgment of the Committee of the Whole. We have presented the bill according to our best judgment. If we have erred, it is for you to correct.

Now, let me say just a word about ammunition, and then I shall close.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman goes to that will he yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Surely.

Mr. MANN. And if it is not a proper question I do not ask for an answer. Great Britain or the allies have possession of the sea at this time, and I suppose have the strongest naval vessels in the world. Why is it that they do not attack German fortifications? Why is it that during the Spanish War our fleet did not capture Havana?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I can give the gentleman only my judgment for what it may be worth, and that is this: I do not think thinking men undertake something that even if successful would accomplish a given thing of less value and at greater cost than could be accomplished by other methods. In other words, it is a good deal better for them to undertake to bottle up Germany's fleet and to control the avenues of trade than it is to take the risk of not only going up against Germany's fleet but also against these fortifications, with the almost certainty that they would not be able to subdue them from the sea. In the Dardanelles there is a different proposition. They are there undertaking to attack those forts because it is necessary in order to get to a given place; but whether their attack will be successful or not remains to be seen. The information that we get in the newspapers is not of sufficient detail to warrant anybody in drawing any conclusion. During the Japanese-Russian War the Japanese fleet lay off Port Arthur, which was not a modern fortification in the sense of some that could be mentioned. After a bombardment of a short time they ceased to attempt its capture from the sea, but undertook its capture from the land, a very difficult operation, too, because Port Arthur from the land was no easy place to take. They did that because they did not believe it was practicable in the proper sense of the term to subdue that fortification from the sea.

As I have said repeatedly, I do not believe our fortifications will ever be put to the test. That is aside from the question of the distant bombardment of cities, but so far as the attempt to subdue those fortifications from the sea is concerned, having the prerequisites that would be necessary to such an attack, I do not believe that any commander of a fleet with ordinary judgment would undertake the task.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman said it would take three years to complete the Cape Henry fortifications. As I understand it, unless we appropriate the whole $1,750,000 that was suggested this year it would not be worth while appropriating anything. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that is about true.

Mr. GARDNER. But if we did appropriate all, the project would be complete one year earlier than if we begin a year from now. Is that correct?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not sure that that is altogether correct. That would seem to be correct, but there are probably some things that need to be done touching the manufacture of ordnance in advance of its manufacture that would not enable us now to immediately go forward, even if we had the money available.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman mean having a new lathe and such things?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not only a new lathe, but there are a number of things. It is a question of capacity, and it is a question of whether other work would not be delayed. All of these matters would control. I am unable to say, but I think there would be some saving, although I do not think it would be a full year.

I want now, Mr. Chairman, to say a word about ammunition, and just a word, because I have delayed the committee too long, and I will try to take up such of these items as may be necessary as we read the bill. For continental United States the estimate of the ammunition desired was that sufficient should be had to supply all the guns for one hour of fire, and that was determined, not by the question of the life of the guns, though that would put a limit to the number of rounds, although that limit is not approached, but it was determined by the time in which a fleet passing a given fortification would likely be engaged. We have of that amount that is deemed requisite something over 73 per cent for guns and mortars. For guns we have of some of the heavy sizes over 100 per cent, and for other guns it runs down. In order to be accurate I will repeat what I read yesterday about that, though I dislike to take the time of the committee unduly. What I read is to be found on page 193 of the hearings. It is as follows:

These seacoast guns range from 6-pounders up to 16-inch. We have 12-inch mortars besides the 6-pounder gun; the allowance is 200 rounds per gun, and we have that all on hand.

The allowance for the 3-inch (15-pounder) guns is 200 rounds per gun, and we have 70 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 4-inch guns is 150 rounds per gun, and we have 132 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 4.72-inch guns is 150 rounds per gun, and we have 85 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 5-inch guns is 125 rounds, and we have 118 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 6-inch guns is 125 rounds, and we have 76 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 8-inch guns is 90 rounds per gun, and we have 91 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 10-inch guns is 60 rounds per gun, and we have 101 per cent on hand.

The allowance for the 12-inch gun is 45 rounds per gun, and we have 110 per cent of projectiles on hand, but only 85 per cent of powder.

For the 14-inch guns, it is now under manufacture, because there have been no 14-inch guns yet mounted in continental United States. They are in process of manufacture and of being mounted.

For the 16-inch guns we have only one that will be sent down to Panama, and the carriage for it will be finished this coming summer. Now, I do not think that is altogether a most desirable condition in regard to ammunition. I am going to be perfectly frank with this committee. I do not think it is an alarming condition, because I do not think you are ever going to have anything like all of your guns on one coast, let alone on both coasts, in action or involved.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Without referring to any present fortification, take the fortification at the entrance to Chesapeake Bay which is proposed, is it designed under the plan now in operation to have at that point ammunition only for one hour's firing?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I would not say that.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking now of any particular place, but of the plan.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think so. I think it was in contemplation an hour's supply for all guns, but that does not necessarily mean that that would all be equally distributed in percentages for all the guns. There are a number of guns—for instance, guns here at the Potomac—that would not need to have any ammunition, in my judgment, and that ammunition, so far as it was of a size suitable for other guns, will be put at other places.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the fleet was on the Atlantic Ocean at some place and we might not know just where it was and it should appear off the coast of New York or Chesapeake Bay or some other place farther north or south, what good would it do to have a lot of ammunition in Washington?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not think it would do any. I do not think they ought to have any at Washington.

Mr. MANN. What good would it do to have it anywhere else except the point where the fleet appeared?

Mr. SHERLEY. That would depend upon how soon it could be gotten there and how soon needed. If the gentleman by his questions means to imply that he thinks there should be a sufficient quantity at each place, except those so placed where nobody expects them to be attacked, and where they could not be without the reduction of other forts, why I quite agree with him.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean by my question to imply anything, but I will say to the gentleman I have heard the statement made several times to the House that while the design was to have ammunition for one hour's firing of all the guns that, of course, did not mean that all the guns would be fired at once, but I have not been quite able to understand what advantage it is to have a lot of ammunition at San Francisco when the fleet was at New York.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply wish to say that the theory upon which the allotment was made was not so much the transfer of ammunition from point to point on a given coast as it was the transfer of ammunition from one coast to another with the idea that before we are attacked you would know, according to the country you are having a war with, what coast was going to be involved. Now, I am free to admit I do not altogether share that reasoning. I think Gen. Weaver's position is perhaps the sounder one, and I am inclined to think that the total we ought to aim to have is a supply enough for two hour's continuous firing, and I believe that when the matter is reviewed that will be probably the judgment that will be had touching the matter.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Two hours' continuing firing for the 12-inch guns that it is proposed to mount? That would be how many rounds?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think I could answer the gentleman, but I think it would be something like 90.

Mr. CALDER. That is correct.

Mr. GARDNER. As they are to be remounted, what is the life of the gun, does the gentleman remember, the remounted 12-inch gun with a 700-pound projectile?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not sure in regard to the life of the gun, considering the wear that might have taken place from practice, but with a new gun I think it would be something over 300 rounds.

Mr. GARDNER. At all events, it is adequate?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think so.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Would that apply to the 16-inch gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. It would in a measure, but not entirely so. We have had no experience as to the actual erosion that takes place in the 16-inch gun, because we have not had any that has been fired sufficiently to know it. Presumably the erosion would remain about the same, with a probability it would be a little bit greater in the heavier gun. It also is dependent somewhat upon the foot velocity of the projectile as fired, and one of the reasons why the Army and our Navy, and the English Navy, and others have seen fit to increase the weight of the projectile and lessen the foot velocity has been to get the same force of impact with less wear upon the gun itself so as to prolong the life of the gun, which is very short.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there such a thing as dead shells after long storage?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not say that I know there is; but, so far as I know, the ammunition that we have is all available. Now, the powder that is used is being renewed every year. They use the oldest powder for target practice, and constantly supplant that which is taken out of reserve by the use of the money appropriated for target practice in procuring more; hence you are turning over, to a considerable extent, your powder every year.

Mr. FOWLER. What I am trying to get at is as to what is the average life of the shell in storage?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I do not know; but, so far as I know, there has been no deterioration of the shell as such.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, the ammunition that is placed in a shell. Is it taken out at intervals or is it allowed to remain until used?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not think that the shells are always completely loaded that are in reserve. I am rather inclined to think that in many instances they are not, but the gentleman will appreciate it is very difficult for me to keep all these matters in my head.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. In connection with the amount of reserve ammunition that was under discussion a few minutes ago, this was determined by a board at some time in the not far past, was it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was determined by the Taft Board.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. About 1906?

Mr. SHERLEY. It has been modified somewhat from time to time, by increasing the allowance for the mortars.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. One other question. Was not the quantity determined by the supplying of a sufficient amount of ammunition for each gun for practically the life of the gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think not. I think the amount that was allowed was considerably under the life of a new gun and somewhat under the life of even a gun that has been used quite a bit in practice. And the determining factor was not the life of the gun. In arriving at this amount they determined it on the time that a fleet would be within the range of the guns under battle conditions, as I recall.

Mr. MANN. Might I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I recently visited the fortifications in Panama. I do not desire the question answered unless it is a proper one to ask. My recollection is that at one place there, at least, we saw them filling shells—I do not know whether that is the proper term or not—and it seemed to me from what they said that they must be preparing to keep a much larger supply of shells there than could be used in an hour or two hours of continuous firing, unless they can fire these guns much more rapidly than I had ever supposed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the amount estimated for Panama is the amount estimated for the insular possessions, and that is a two hours' supply.

Mr. MANN. How fast can they fire one of these 8 or 12 inch guns? Does the gentleman happen to remember?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is testified to. I think two shots in a little over a minute in the heavy guns.

Mr. MILLER. I notice in the hearings Gen. Weaver testifies, on page 57, that a two-hours' allowance for a 12-inch gun is 90 rounds; for the 14-inch gun, 80 rounds; and for the 16-inch gun, 70 rounds.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman was asking me about the rapidity of fire.

Mr. MILLER. I understood that was about the maximum rapidity.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, by dividing you would get about the amount.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Has an estimate ever been made of how much ammunition the producers of ammunition could supply the United States if they were forced to do so?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; quite elaborate statements have been made about that in the hearings. I do not want to trust my memory now, but whatever the quantity may have been at the time the estimates were made, I think it has been very greatly increased by virtue of the tremendous activity in America in the manufacture of munitions of war. So that of the evils that have come from the European war, one thing that might be of benefit has occurred, and that is an increase of the capacity of the country for this output.

In regard to the ammunition, I want to say this: Looking back over it, it may be that the amounts that were asked for were not large enough and that the amounts that were given were not large enough. But, again, men are presented with relative propositions. The things that have been hammered at our committee as being the most important have been those relating to mobile artillery and ammunition and in regard to the defenses of the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines. Now, we have undertaken to follow the judgment of these men as to the relative importance of matters. In doing that of necessity men do not quite pay the same attention to some matters that they do to others, because of the pressure that is put upon them. Now, we have this situation confronting us at this time. There was an estimate of $200,000 for this ammunition. The committee allowed it. There was some discussion as to whether we should allow an additional sum. The committee was of the judgment that it was not in a position where it ought to go outside of the estimates; that it could present to this committee the facts, and if this committee saw fit to do it, that was with this committee.

Now, I do not desire to detain the committee longer. When we can come to the reading of the bill, to the extent of my ability I will endeavor to answer questions in regard to the various items. I expect to be able to present before this bill is finished a statement touching the Philippine defenses.

I desire now to say that I do not at all concur in the conclusions reached by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] touching the inadequacy of those defenses. I hope to be able to show where in my judgment he is in error, and I desire to say on behalf of the War Department that this matter has not been neglected. It has not been the result of the opinion of a few men sitting in Washington. The plans for that defense have perhaps received more detailed and repeated consideration than that of any defense either in the insular possessions or here, and men who are on the ground are the men who presented, and in a large measure determined, what should be done in regard to those fortifications. I can not enter into it now without going into a speech of some length, and I am not only tired myself, but I am sure the committee is tired, and when we get to it in the bill I will hope to present a plain statement. But it is perfectly manifest that our committee could not follow with any degree of success the plan suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota. He wanted us to summon an officer who was stationed there and who had certain views about what should be done. Some of those views have been in a great measure concurred in by other officers. Others of them have been concurred in by some other officers, and the matter had been passed upon by a board qualified to judge.

Mr. MILLER. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair. I did not simply suggest one officer alone. I suggested his name because he was here. There are others here also of the same opinion, and if the gentlemen of the committee had desired to enter upon an investigation I should have been pleased to furnish their names. I do not want it understood that this is the only man that held those opinions.

Mr. SHERLEY. This is the only officer I recall the gentleman mentioning to me.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I say, again, that we are confronted with a proposition of whether the committee should sit as a board of inquiry upon whether the defense plans passed upon by the Regular Army board were sufficient or whether the judgment of some officer who had not had his view accepted was to be taken. I submit, in all candor, that the committee followed the common-sense course. And I say another thing, namely, that whenever you get a committee undertaking to listen to and air the views of any officer who happens not to have his viewpoint accepted, you will be traveling far afield, and have a herculean job on your hands, with no result or benefit to the country at large.

Complaint is made of the fact that the flanks of these fortifications are not defended by fortifications. If they had been, I suppose complaint would then have been made that the flanks of those flanks were not defended, and so on ad infinitum. As a matter of fact, they put the fortifications on islands, and not on the mainland, because of the well-known superiority of an island for a fortification as compared with the mainland, and without now going into the matter, I desire to repeat that I do not think the criticisms that the gentleman made are well founded.

Touching the Hawaiian Islands and the land defense there, in justice to myself I should say again that I accepted the viewpoint of the War Department over considerable opposition of some gentlemen who did not want to do anything in regard to the land defenses, and this was at a time when men, then Members of Congress, were silent as to the need of these things being done.

Let me say in justice to the Fortifications Committee that we have for several years past given the money for every gun asked for the insular possessions. We have given the money for all accessories, the searchlights, fire-control mines, and ammunition, and as to ammunition, the supply is a two hours' supply for all the guns. The fortifications of Hawaii are completed except as to a small part of the land defenses, which are provided for in this bill. As to the Philippines, the money has practically all been appropriated, most of the work is done, and the rest is being done as fast as physically possible, and the same statement can be made as to Panama, and the defenses are modern and adequate.

Mr. Chairman, I have detained the committee very much too long. I am very much indebted to you, gentlemen, for your attention, and I shall be glad, as far as I may, to answer inquiries when we come to the consideration of the items. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in the negative of the motion to strike out the last word. I am going to discuss under the five-minute rule later most of these items.

The gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. SHERLEY] read the evidence of Gen. Wood, and then said I was trying to give the House the idea that the situation had changed of late years; that there was a sudden and marked increase in the attacking power of the war vessels which we might regard as possible opponents. That is correct. I had intended to give that impression, and I had intended to give that impression because it is true. There are built and building and authorized in the wide world to-day just 39 ships that carry 14-inch guns and heavier, and of those 39 ships just 9 are now sailing the ocean, and the other 30 are in process of construction or have been authorized.

Now, that is the reason why this change has come, and at the time when Gen. Wood gave his evidence I do not think that his evidence on its face shows that he completely understood the question that was asked of him. As a matter of fact, when he gave that evidence, in December, 1912, the condition did not exist that exists to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to this whole question of guns and fortifications, as to the question of how soon you shall put the guns into the scrap heap, the question of how soon you shall put the old fortifications into the scrap heap, that is all only a question of degree. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] thinks you should be a long while about it. I believe you should be a short while about it. I believe, no matter what the expense is of rapidly throwing out the old equipment as it becomes partially antiquated, it should be done, and I believe in rebuilding fortifications much more rapidly than does the gentleman.

Now, what is the situation? When I was a red-headed boy of 19 years of age the Endicott Board began its life, and we are still proceeding to fortify under the plans of the Endicott Board, somewhat modified by the plans of the Taft Board, and here and there by an occasional change in addition.

Oh, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] smiles; but that is one of his favorite methods of arguing. But we are proceeding, as appears from the evidence, on the plans of the Endicott Board. That board was instituted when I was a red-headed lad of 19 years old, and now I am a white-haired man who will be half a century old on my next birthday. Yet in these many years we have not yet come within sight of the completion of the project of the Endicott Board. It is nowhere near completed. The Secretary of War testified the other day, according to page 25 of the hearings, that we need $40,000,000 more to bring these plans of fortifications to completion. Yet we have been appropriating in the last 10 years an average of only $1,150,000 toward our fortifications. At that rate, Mr. Chairman, it will be 34 years more before this project will be complete, and instead of being a man of 50 years old I shall be a lean and slippered pantaloon of 84. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that the committee did not want to go outside the estimates, in spite of the fact that the Secretary of War testified on page 42 that if he were making the estimates to-day he would make them greater. The gentleman from Kentucky says that the committee would be put under pressure if it went outside the estimates. That is true. We all are put under pressure all the time by people who wish us to spend money. So is the Committee on Naval Affairs under pressure. The Committee on Naval Affairs, however, went outside the estimates, because the members knew that the national defense demanded that they should go outside the estimates. They were not willing to lie back and put the responsibility on the Secretary of the Navy for making low estimates when they knew that more money ought to be expended on our Navy.

That is the situation which faced the Committee on Fortifications, with this exception, that the Secretary of War told them that the estimates would have been higher if made later in the year, while the Secretary of the Navy never told the Committee on Naval Affairs that his estimates were too low, although that certainly was the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

For construction of gun and mortar batteries, $585,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARDNER: Page 2, line 4, strike out "$585,000" and insert "$1,835,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, if that amendment is adopted it will allow the expenditure of one million and a quarter of dollars for the fortifications of Cape Henry, at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, and later on I shall offer another amendment to allow $500,000 to be expended on the armament of those fortifications, making in all the one million and three-quarters which the Secretary of War told the committee that we ought to provide if we provide anything at all.

Here is what this Taft Board said nine years ago, in 1906, about this question of Chesapeake Bay:

Commercially and strategically Chesapeake Bay is to-day, as it has always been, of the very first importance. With the entrance as it is now, unfortified, a hostile fleet, should it gain control of the sea, can establish without coming under the fire of a single gun a base on its shores, pass in and out at its pleasure, have access to large quantities of valuable supplies at all times, and paralyze the great trunk lines crossing the head of the bay.

That is what the board said nine years ago, and not one spade full of earth has been turned since that day to remedy that state of affairs. Now, the land has been bought and paid for. We have put all that through. The plan for fortification and armament is complete. We know what it is going to cost. Why not appropriate? Because it would require a supplemental estimate; because the plans were not ready until after the regular estimates were made up last June? Is that a sufficient reason, Mr. Chairman?

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will perhaps say, as he did a little while ago, that the enemy must first dispose of our fleet before its fleet can enter the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, and that the enemy will first have to dispose of our submarines. The fact is the enemy will not have to do all that. The submarines on the Atlantic coast have mostly disposed of themselves, except those at the Panama Canal. They tried to mobilize under the order of Admiral Fletcher last November. When the commander of the flotilla, Commander Yates Sterling, jr., reported, he announced that only one of the submarines was in condition to dive. It was not his fault. He had called the attention of the Navy Department over and over again to the condition of the submarine fleet, and what had happened? He was reproved by the Secretary of the Navy for so doing.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. If Congress nine years ago had appropriated for fortifying the Chesapeake, does the gentleman contend that those fortifications would now be such that he would be willing to accept them to-day?

Mr. GARDNER. No; we should probably have had to change them two or three times. They would be just as much out of date as your other old fortifications are that I am trying to get brought up to date.

Mr. GOOD. Then, it was the part of wisdom to postpone, at least for nine years, the commencement of that work.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, by the same rule it would have been the part of wisdom if I had not insured my automobile last year, because I did not run into anybody. I should have saved that amount of money. No; the part of wisdom would have been to have completed the fortifications then, and, as they became antiquated, renew them, instead of waiting.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows, of course, that the plan of the War Department at that time and for a number of years thereafter was to build an artificial island in the mouth of the Chesapeake that would have cost a number of million dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. Thirty million dollars.

Mr. GARDNER. That may very well have been the best plan. I do not know. But I know this, that if you wait until you get a perfect plan you will never do anything at all; and that would just suit a great many people. There is nothing that is not growing old. Gentlemen say, "Wait until we see what happens in Europe. Wait until we see what happens next." We have been waiting nine years for a better plan for the defenses at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay down below here. We have been waiting a good while, and we will go on waiting from now until doomsday if we are going to wait until we get a perfect plan.

Mr. MADDEN. We have been at peace with all the world during the nine years, have we not?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And we are likely to be.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman says we are likely to be. If everybody agreed with the gentleman, what would be the use of spending any money at all on defenses?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this question of preparation is all a question of degree. We all agree that there must be reasonable and proper preparation for the possibility and eventuality of hostilities. The only differences arise out of the different views we hold as to what at a certain time and under certain conditions constitutes reasonable preparedness. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] takes a rather extreme view of the matter. I do not altogether disagree with the gentleman from Massachusetts. For, while I would not be inclined and am not inclined to follow him to the length to which he would go, I think the gentleman has performed a helpful and patriotic service in calling attention to some deficiencies and in urging a little more earnestness and possibly just a little more rapidity in carrying out our plans of defense. But we have not neglected this in the past.

We have expended for fortifications in the last 10 years something more than $75,000,000 in addition to all our other war expenditures. In 10 years we have spent on our national defenses, including the bills now reported, $2,754,000,000. And as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has just suggested, we have been at peace with all the world all this time. Therefore, so far and up to date, so far as the expenditure has had any effect on our relationship with the world, it has not seemed to be altogether necessary. And yet it has been wise and proper expenditure, and it should be continued in a reasonable, sensible way.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] in his view that there is any condition now existing which justifies a special speeding up in the matter of preparation for war or in matters of defense, for two reasons: First, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] very clearly pointed out, no expenditure that we could now make, for permanent fortifications at least, could avail us anything in the improbable case of our becoming embroiled in the troubles now going on in Europe; and, secondly, because I view this as a peculiarly proper time for us to emphasize the fact that while we believe in proper preparation for defense we are not a military people. We do not believe in great armies and great armaments; and with all the world of Europe illustrating the frightful losses and the fearful devastation of war, this is an excellent time for us to emphasize our love and desire for peace. While we should not check our proper preparation for defense, this is not, in my opinion, the time for us to embark upon sudden, extravagant, and ambitious schemes of militarism.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it on account of the state of the Treasury that the gentleman opposes this particular amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all.

Mr. GARDNER. That was the Secretary's reason for not submitting the estimate, was it not?

Mr. MONDELL. My view of that is this, that while there are many expenditures which we might make properly, which we need not make when the Treasury is in its present unfortunate situation, if, as a matter of fact, we need to expend money for defense or preparation for defense, we ought to do it without regard to the condition of the Treasury. [Applause.] So that my view of the matter is not in any wise affected by the condition of the Treasury. We should sell bonds or raise money by further special war taxation if it were necessary, beyond a peradventure, for us to prepare for a more perfect defense. I do not think it is true that conditions are such as to demand or warrant any further speeding up than is contemplated, but I do not arrive at that conclusion because the Treasury is well-nigh empty.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The most hopeful sign that I have seen recently is the calm, serene, and peaceful condition which now seems to possess the soul of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The country is indeed safe. The storms that were lowering upon our fair land but a short season ago have vanished. I recall distinctly, in our recent apprehended troubles with Mexico, the perfervid manner of my pleasant, my much-admired friend from Wyoming, a gentleman whom I esteem very highly indeed, when he was appealing and praying for a strong hand to stop the unspeakable atrocities, as he then described them, that were being perpetrated in Mexico. I can see him with his muscles quivering, with his face as florid as the setting autumn sun, screaming and shouting for the time to come when the administration would cease to hesitate to intervene and stop the unparalleled and awful outrages in Mexico. It was something really appalling. You would have thought that the occasion was one in which our Army and our fleet should at once be mobilized and go instanter into Mexico. But times have changed, I am glad to say, and peace reigns.

For some good and substantial reason the gentleman from Wyoming has grounded arms, and we are not to have this war that he was pleading for. War has suddenly come to be unpopular. There was a time when men over on that side of the aisle were groping around this way and the other trying to find something out of which to make an issue. At one time it looked like it would be a popular thing to intervene in Mexico and to stop all of these outrageous cruelties that the gentleman from Wyoming was painting in such a lurid fashion before the House at that time. But now we have had object lessons of war and the people have grown wiser along that line. The administration's course, I apprehend, in keeping out of Mexico, has met with approval somewhere, or else the gentleman from Wyoming would be the last man to hoist the white flag, as he has here to-day, and wave the banner of peace instead of the red flag of intervention.

As I say, this war is not as popular as it was, and now on the other side of the question he is preaching peace. It is a popular thing now to preach peace, and no better indication of the drift of sentiment throughout the country at large than the present attitude of my good genial friend from Wyoming could be had, because he has his ear especially tuned to the popular wave, and I take it that we are not to have this war in Mexico that loomed up threatening on the horizon.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman does not think that the American people would consent to have one of their wars in the middle of the newspaper when other wars were on the front page?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is getting me out into deep water; he will have to make things a little more plain to me.

Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman think that a war between the United States and Mexico would be on the inside of the newspaper?

Mr. HELM. Decidedly; in other words, a Mexican war would be like a side show compared with Barnum & Bailey's circus under the main tent.

Mr. GARDNER. And the self-respect of the American people would not consent to have their own war confined to the middle of the newspaper while other wars occupied the front page.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Massachusetts will not be confined to the inside of the newspaper, because he occupies the first column on the front page. I do not know how it happens, but I think it is fine entertainment; we all like to get up in the morning and read something in box-car letters on the front page as to what the gentleman from Massachusetts is doing. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from Wyoming will allow me, I would like to ask unanimous consent to limit debate on this item to 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know but that I would like 10 minutes myself, and then the gentleman from Kentucky may want more time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope we may proceed with the bill with some rapidity, because it is desirable to finish it to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. I make the suggestion, because it is possible that I may ask for more than five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then make it 15 minutes. I will say to the gentleman that there are other items that gentlemen can speak on, on the general subject of fortification, unless the gentleman from Wyoming desires to speak to this particular item.

Mr. MONDELL. I made the suggestion because I may ask for more than five minutes on this one item.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this item close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this item close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes when the gentleman from Wyoming has completed his remarks. I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky would object when he knows what I am going to say.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will give the gentleman two minutes out of my five, for I want but three.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am never so charmed as I am in listening to my genial and eloquent friend from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] who has just taken his seat. He has many splendid qualities, but he shines above all other things in the possession, first, of a marvelous imagination and, second, of wider, broader, deeper, and more illimitable information in regard to things that are not so than any gentleman of my acquaintance. The gentleman is disturbed because I am not preaching war and bloodshed and insurrection. I am not one of those people who have made a profession of love of peace at any price; but if the gentleman from Kentucky had followed me, as one would imagine he had from what he has just said, he would know that I have never been much enamored of war and military establishment. I look upon military establishments as an unfortunate, a sad, necessity, as a necessary evil. The gentleman illustrated his marvelous genius for imagination by his reference to what I have said at one time and another in regard to our attitude touching Mexico. Evidently the gentleman did not do me the honor of listening to what I said yesterday on that subject. As a matter of fact, it is altogether evident that he has never listened to what I have said on the subject at any time, much less read what I have said on the subject.

The gentleman's imagination leads him to infer from some mention I have made of the situation in Mexico that I have been preaching intervention, war, bloodshed, and that I have been desirous of having armies sent across our southern border to devastate the land. If the gentleman had relied upon the facts more and his imagination less, he would have recalled that I not only have never preached intervention in Mexico, but that I voted against the little, inglorious war that the President brought on with Mexico—a war which, but for the glorious gallantry and heroism of the men wearing our uniform, was as inglorious as it was brief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman appears to know a great deal with regard to what I have said about Mexico which is not so. From the very first mention I made of the blunders—I might almost say the crimes—of this administration touching Mexico and her people, one year ago the 27th of this month, I have insisted that there was no necessity, demand, or reason for our intervening in Mexico.

The policy adopted by the administration was a policy which led inevitably to intervention. It was intervention, unarmed and indirect, but intervention, nevertheless; intervention in behalf of one of the contending parties, and intervention that led to war and cost us the lives of something like a score of splendid young fellows and, in addition, something like fifteen to eighteen millions of dollars cash and great deterioration and loss to our Atlantic Fleet lying down there in the waters of the Gulf for well-nigh a year. The only reason why we did not have a big war with Mexico when the President brought on the little inglorious war was that the faction we struck in Mexico was not strong enough to strike back. Then, like the King of France, who, with a hundred thousand men, marched upon the hill and then marched down again, we, after losing the lives of 20 fine young fellows, killing several hundred Mexicans, and spending $15,000,000, marched home again without having accomplished anything. There was a lot of talk about an insult to the flag. Was there any reparation? Was anyone compelled to salute the flag? Was there ever any demand made and enforced that that alleged insult to the flag should be apologized for or that there should be reparation made? No. We sacrificed 20 good lives, young, vigorous, hearty fellows; we killed a lot of folks who had done us no harm; we spent our money like water and kept our men and ships down there in the rotting climate of the Mexican Gulf, and then sailed away with the question just where it was when we started. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, within a few days I shall have been a Member of this body for 12 years. During that time I have never risen to a question of personal privilege, and do not now, but I hold in my hand a paper published at Staunton, Va., under date of Tuesday, February 23, 1915, and in it are some headlines that do an injustice, in my judgment, to one of the distinguished Members of this House. I am quoted as declaring in the discussions that took place on Saturday last that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is a "featherweight" and a "bootlicker." Anyone reading the text knows that I did not in any degree refer to the gentleman from Virginia, and anyone who heard the controversy knows that that was not the case. So far as the gentleman from Virginia is concerned, he was vigorously defending his bill, which it was his duty to do, and I think he was doing it in a proper and in a gentlemanly manner, and instead of calling forth any condemnation on my part I had only praise for the manner in which he did it. I think it only right to make this statement in behalf of the gentleman from Virginia, whom I esteem as my friend, and whom I believe to be one of the ablest and most gentlemanly Members of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have already said so much about Cape Henry that it is unnecessary that I should say much more. If we are going upon the theory of carrying in this bill everything which is desirable, we will have a bill that will carry not $6,000,000 but several times $6,000,000. As I undertook to say in my general statement, Congress must consider not only the desirability of doing a thing, but the relative desirability of doing things, and must consider total expenditures that are to be made at any given time. I have no doubt that the committee will be urged, and will doubtless see fit, to recommend at the next session of Congress the initiation of the emplacement and armament work for Cape Henry, and that, having undertaken it, it will be pushed as fast as is physically possible. I question whether we ought to now appropriate this money. If I were going to appropriate additional sums, I think that there are other matters that could be urged with much more insistence than this; and I believe, as has been repeatedly said, that there is nothing in the situation that now confronts the country to warrant us in losing our judgment or undertaking to greatly accelerate the speed with which we are providing armament for continental United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman in his address this morning to indicate that an appropriation at this time in relation to the fortifications at Cape Henry would not expedite the consummation of the scheme.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not put it that strong. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asked me if it would expedite it to the extent of a year, and I said I thought not. I think, even if the money were at hand at the present time, that there would be considerable delay touching the manufacture of the guns, and that is the thing that will control that would prevent our getting the benefit of a full year over a next year's appropriation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman means that it will take approximately a year to make the guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; it will take nearly three years to make the guns, but it would be necessary to get certain machinery and be prepared to undertake the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is authorized to grant to the Norfolk Southern Railroad Co., its successors and assigns, a perpetual right of way through the lands which have been or which may be acquired for fortification purposes at Cape Henry, Va., on such location as he may approve, in exchange for all of said company's lands and rights of way lying within the boundaries of the lands acquired or to be acquired for said fortification purposes: Provided, That the said railroad company may be reimbursed from appropriations which may be applicable to the construction of defenses at Cape Henry, Va., for the expense which may be imposed upon the said railroad company in changing the location of its tracks, stations, or other buildings and appurtenances from their present location on the said lands and rights of way of the said railroad company to the right of way hereinbefore authorized to be granted to the said company by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he will tolerate my addressing the committee for 8 or 10 minutes?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I have something that I would like much to say to the committee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be an alarmist. If I should attempt to be, I would be dissatisfied with myself; but events have happened and words have been said within the last few hours touching our relations with belligerent nations calculated to fill us with apprehension. I do not want to say in these few minutes anything that may be misunderstood or misleading, but when a gentleman of the great ability and capacity for statesmanship, well recognized the world over, the former President of the United States, Mr. Taft, tells his countrymen that they are approaching a danger, I think the time is here to take heed lest an awful calamity may befall us. Within the last few hours an American ship has been sunk in the North Sea. It is true she carried cotton and, fortunately, no passengers. It is said she was insured by this Government. That I do not know, neither, for this time, do I care; but I do know that she was an American ship and sunk by some force without. That force I do not attempt to describe or the nation applying it do I attempt to indicate, therefore I do not hold anyone responsible for the loss or invasion of an American right. That ship, in my judgment, was where she had a right to be, but it was where she ought not to have been. Is not there some one in this country strong enough to take the part of our own people by keeping them from harm? I was greatly pleased, I even applauded the declaration which the President made some time ago cautioning all of his people to neutrality, to moderation of speech, to temperate language, and good behavior. In my judgment the wishes of the President as expressed in that proclamation have been largely complied with by the American people. I believe that he ought now to go further.

I wish the President of the United States could see it to be his duty to make another proclamation, to warn these shipowners, to warn those who sail ships and carry produce upon the seas to these belligerent nations, to keep away from this death zone. A few minutes ago I was in conversation with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He and I are two men who recall well the effect the destruction of American property and the destruction of American lives has upon the American people, for we sat here in 1898 when the American people crowded around this Capitol and forced men like the gentleman and myself who had determined, for ourselves, that there should be no war, into a declaration in favor of it. Why can not the President of the United States make another proclamation in which he might say, if he would permit a humble individual like me to suggest it, what our rights are according to the numerous treaties; that we have the right by reason of them to be where we now are; that we have the right to go beyond this dead line marked out by these belligerents. It is true it may be agreed by that that we should attend the markets of belligerents and our safety was thereby guaranteed while we delivered our products. Why does he not go further and say, if you go, you go upon your own risk. [Applause.] Why does he not say to these market men, if you lose your ship it goes down as your ship and we will not redden the waters of the Atlantic with the blood of American soldiers and sailors in order to make good what you have lost. [Applause.] Why does he not say to these belligerents, you are avoiding and violating the laws of neutrality, the specifications and stipulations found in your agreements with us, and when this war is over, when peace once more comes and brings a return of the composure and calmness which you had before this war began, we will hold you responsible in the tribunal already established to the end that you will make good the loss you have put upon our American people. These crafty—I withdraw the word—the American is hunting for trade. The cotton man has cotton to sell, the corn farmer has corn to sell, every American has something to sell. It is much better that it should waste and rot where it grew, even our Nation paying the grower in some measure for it, than in any way to involve ourselves in a war by endeavoring to deliver it to these belligerent nations. [Applause.]

Do not think, my friends, for a minute, that I am begging the question or that I am taking the part of cowardice. It is not true. I strive to do no more than call your attention to the great danger that confronts us and one we are likely to be in at any minute because of the persistent attempts which these men of trade may bring to us. It seems to me that our statesmen and our great men in whose hands our safety lies should at this time do all they know how to do in order to avoid even the possibility of trouble on account of our trade with these belligerents. Ex-President Taft has told us of our rights. He told us of the violation of them, but like many others who have spoken upon the same subject, he did not point out how to avoid the dangers that confront us. Here is what he said, in part:

In preserving the commerce of the United States with the belligerents, however, we are face to face with a crisis. We are threatened with a serious invasion of our rights as a neutral in trading with the belligerent countries. What certainly is an innovation upon previous rules in respect to neutral commerce and contraband of war has been initiated by the belligerents of both sides. The planting of mines in the open sea and the use of submarines to send neutral vessels to the bottom without inquiry as to their neutrality, when found in a so-called war zone of the open sea, are all of them a variation from the rules of international law governing the action of belligerents toward neutral trade. When their violation results in the destruction of lives of American citizens, or of American property, a grave issue will arise as to what the duty of the Government is. The responsibility of the President and Congress in meeting the critical issue thus presented in maintaining our national rights and our national honor, on the one hand, with due regard to the awful consequences to our 90,000,000 of people of engaging in this horrible world war, on the other, will be very great.

Perhaps I am wrong in suggesting that this warning should come from the President of the United States. I know of no other authority that would command as high attention. It ought surely to come from somewhere, from some of our officials in supreme authority. If not from them, then it should come by resolution from this House [applause], that we will not vote the necessary money, that we will not ask soldiers to enlist for a war made necessary only through the cupidity of the American people. If these belligerents want our goods, contraband or otherwise, let them come in their own ships with their own crews and get the loads on our wharves. Is there no one but me to advocate the use of the strong arm to prevent the risk we are running? Yes, use force, if it can be legally employed, to keep us from the place we are told not to enter. I am perfectly willing to stand by what I have said if I stand alone. Let me repeat, the young American ought to understand that he will not be expected to enlist to punish either of these belligerent nations for acts committed in this death zone upon our commerce which we are endeavoring to carry on with them. They are mad and in great anger—nations that observe their treaty rights in time of peace, but can scarcely be expected to observe them under present conditions. It is beyond reason to expect it. Mr. Chairman, this little ship which went down, as I have said, was an American ship.

I have seen it stated somewhere that the owners of the ship claim she was lost at their own risk. Thus we have escaped. Anyhow, I do not imagine that our Government would hold the destroying power responsible for her loss. To-morrow there may be another. Perhaps the next day still another. How long will the Americans remain patient? Do not put them to the test with too frequent experiments. It was stated this morning that some of her crew were lost. Poor fellows, their destruction did not provoke much comment. But why further tempt us? After a while perhaps one of these belligerents may charge the other with the commission of these wrongs upon our people and our commerce. Oh, the side upon which this Government should throw her power would win in this war. Can it be possible that any of these belligerents would purposely involve us? Heaven forbid this affliction to come to us.

Gentlemen who were Members of this House when the Maine was sunk remember distinctly that few questions were asked. Three hundred Americans had perished. The loss of the ship we could account for, but the loss of Americans inflamed the people, until they arose and demanded that the deaths of their sailormen should be avenged. No power can resist such a force. We could not do it then. I feel we are under better restraint now, but let us not be tempted.

Is there no one to speak? Is there no one in authority strong enough to say the right word now, so that the nations may understand and the belligerents may know that if our ships are torpedoed in those waters into which these madmen warn us not to come the sons of America shall not for that cause alone enlist to punish the guilty, and thus perhaps take the part of some belligerent. These belligerents are not affronting us. They have not invaded our territory, disputed our boundaries, nor willfully assaulted us. It is true they agreed we should go into the North Sea. They made the contract that the ocean should be open to us upon certain conditions. Are we not reasonable men? Can we not understand that when men are mad and inflamed with passion they will not reason? We can not expect these belligerents to parley with us now. They are beyond that point. They are spilling the blood of each other. They have defined this death zone. They have told us to stay away from it. Then, in the name of God's service, for the safety of our people, and for the love of humanity, let some one, and the right one, tell these American traders they must stay away from these fields of death. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

What the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my distinguished colleague, Mr. BUTLER, has said finds a very responsive chord in the hearts of most of us, whether we vote with him or not. It is especially interesting to me because this morning I took occasion to introduce two resolutions, one requesting of the Secretary of the Treasury information as to the insurance of the steamship Evelyn, which was destroyed by a mine day before yesterday, and the other seeking information and particulars as to the ownership of the vessels and cargoes, the premiums paid, and so forth, of all vessels insured by the United States War Risk Insurance Bureau.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asks if anyone will rise and say the word that is necessary now to be said to foreign nations as well as to the people of the United States to stop our being drawn into a possible conflict. The gentleman suggests it might be the President. Well, how can the President of the United States rise and say that word now? He urged this Congress to pass a bill in order that we might further the export trade, that we might further the individual fortunes that are to be made by reason of the war necessities of our friends upon the other side of the water. The President had rushed through this House a bill taking the people's money to establish an insurance company in the name of the Government of the United States to encourage American traders and the manipulators in cotton, in arms, and in grain to use foreign as well as American ships, thus inviting the very disaster that occurred over yonder near by the port of Bremen day before yesterday.

In addition to this the President of the United States had rushed through this House a bill requiring us to take $30,000,000 of the money of the people to buy foreign ships to still further encourage American as well as foreign traders, manipulators, and speculators in cotton and grain and in the munitions of war to challenge the destruction of ships, violate neutrality, and disturb the peaceful relations for which my friend from Pennsylvania pleads so eloquently. How can the President of the United States speak that word the gentleman from Pennsylvania hopes for now? He has gone too far. He has listened to the voice of the trader, to the voice of the speculator, to the voice of the manipulator; he has listened to the voice of the money-maker, and he has put it up to the people to pay the loss upon their ships. I wish with my colleague that the President might rise to the situation and tell the exporters and the traders to keep out of forbidden territory. I hope he will do this before it is too late.

Of what concern is the loss of the Evelyn to the gentlemen who owned the ship? Nothing compared to ours. The Government insured them. The loss is not their loss. No; it is not the manipulator's loss; it is not the speculator's loss. We assumed their responsibility. They have unloaded on the Government of the United States. The President of the United States and this Congress, acting at his dictation, swallowed the bait. It is the American people who are liable for this sort of manipulation, for this speculation, for this risk. The President and Congress have made the people of the United States the surety for those who are speculating in cotton or in grain to make money.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, I wish somebody would rise now and explain why we ventured upon this hazardous business. Why was this War Risk Bureau established at the expense of the people of the United States to protect speculators? I wish some one who favored this legislation would rise now and tell us why we want to buy more of these old hulks. The Evelyn was 32 years old; she had been a wreck, and yet we passed a wrecking bill a few days ago to admit more of her kind to American registry. She was wrecked in 1897, and got the American flag because she was a wreck. I wish some one would rise now and tell us why we passed that bill. Why, gentlemen, everything we said in opposition to the war-risk bill, everything we said in opposition to the wrecking bill, everything we said in opposition to the shipping bill has been proven by this one incident of the mining of the Evelyn. It is your ship, the kind of a ship you wanted the Government to own. It belonged to your speculators; it belonged to the men in New York who wanted to make money, and for whom the President and the Democratic Congress stood sponsor. I sincerely trust it is not too late to stop this kind of business. I hope it is not too late to listen to the appeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]. Some one in authority ought to say that the United States will no longer stand for this sort of manipulation, this speculation and money-making. Some one should be firm enough to tell these people who want to go into these war zones to make money, whether they involve us in war or not, that they go in at their own risk, and that the United States will not assume the responsibility for their acts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction of mining casemates, cable galleries, torpedo storehouses, cable tanks, and other structures necessary for the operation, preservation, and care of submarine mines and their accessories, and for providing channels for access to torpedo wharves, $31,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

At this point in the estimates appeared a provision for the construction of landing facilities at Outer Brewster Island, Boston, Mass., $50,000. As I understand it, the purpose of that landing facility is to improve the adjuncts to the existing fortifications; that is to say, it is proposed, in order to increase the efficiency of existing fortifications in Boston Harbor. I find on page 143 of the hearings that Mr. SHERLEY says to Gen. Weaver:

In other words, you are simply proposing now to use it as a site for searchlights?

He is there speaking about Outer Brewster Island. Gen. Weaver says:

Yes; and range-finding station. We can improve thereby very much the accuracy of fire, particularly of the mortar battery at Peddocks Island at Fort Andrews.

He then goes on to say that, in his opinion, later on there will have to be some primary guns installed at Outer Brewster Island, but that, ad interim, Outer Brewster is to be used for approved existing defenses. The Secretary of War thought that that was so necessary, in spite of the fact that he cut down the estimates to the bone, and in a great many places far below the bone—nevertheless in this particular instance the estimates ought not to be cut. This is one of the few items where the committee did not appropriate that which is recommended by the Secretary; and I shall be glad if the chairman would explain the situation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee did not recommend the $50,000 asked because it was expected to be expended in a wharf for Outer Brewster Island, and as no provision was made or asked for either the searchlights or the range-finding matériel for the island we felt that we could properly postpone this item for the wharf and let it be carried at the time the other items were carried and there would be no resulting delay. I am inclined to agree with what the Chief of the Coast Artillery said as to the probability that next year there will be presented to us a scheme for the fortification of Outer Brewster Island, perhaps with a primary battery. In that event it is very likely the landing facilities might be something different from what is now contemplated, and in view of the fact that no delay would result thereby, the committee felt warranted in eliminating this item of $50,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Can the gentleman give me any idea as to what class the primary guns would be, the number of calibers or the diameter?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not, except to this extent: I do not think any plan has been worked out, but the gentleman is familiar with the report of the board recently assembled as to the character of primary armament that should be used in the future, in which they recommend the use of guns of not less than 16-inch diameter and mortars of not less than our most modern 12-inch mortar. Whether it would be desirable to put guns or mortars there I am not advised.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has for the second, and possibly for the third, time referred on this floor to the sinking of the American cotton steamer Evelyn at a time when neither he nor even the officials charged with the duty of investigating know anything about the facts in the case. But he continues to demand why there was a cotton steamer in a place where it was liable to be sunk, as near as I can make out.

Now, as a matter of interest, I would like to know what the gentleman would say if all the cotton of the United States were still held in storage in this country and had no foreign outlet at all. I am very curious to know exactly what kind of a speech the gentleman would make under those circumstances.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. BORLAND. No. I refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. That is the ultimate logic of his position, that we still ought to have our cotton, and not so much as to attempt to find a foreign market for it by the aid of war insurance or any other method. So many of these things are quoted by our distinguished friends on the Republican side, showing that business conditions must be in a terrible condition in this country, that I want to call their attention to the trade report of last week, as published in the Kansas City Star of Sunday, February 21, in which it is stated that—

Exports of merchandise in January exceeded imports by $145,536,103, the largest balance on record for any month. This is what the completed figures show: Exports were $267,801,370, about $64,000,000 more than a year ago, and imports were $122,265,267, or thirty-two and one-half millions less than in January, 1913.

So that it is not true that a flood of imports is coming into this country to demoralize American business. I read further:

In December and January the excess of exports was $276,000,000. Net gold imports last month were $6,204,889.

But gentlemen will say that is all war material. Gentlemen will say that somebody is sending abroad war materials; that nobody is sending abroad anything on earth except war materials. Let us see whether that is the case. Last week nearly 390,000 bales of cotton went abroad; nearly three times as much as in the corresponding week a year ago.

But these gentlemen come from the manufacturing States. How about our friends from the agricultural States? This article that I have in my hand shows that the total farm value of farm products for the year 1914 is $4,936,000,000—$300,000,000 more than the average for the preceding five years. So that the American farmer to-day is $300,000,000 richer than in any year during the preceding five-year period. And can it be possible, with the American farmer $300,000,000 richer than he was and 390,000 bales of cotton going abroad in a single week, that business is going to smash in every locality in this country?

Certainly not. Here are the bank clearings in the last week. It shows a decrease in the clearings in New York City, which is the index of the general business of the country; but it shows 13 cities of the country where there was an increase in clearings over last year, beginning with 1 per cent in the city of Richmond and running to 60 per cent increase in Oklahoma City.

Mr. MADDEN. How much would an increase of 60 per cent in Oklahoma City be? Not over $125,000.

Mr. BORLAND. It would be very substantial for Oklahoma City. The gentleman can make fun of Oklahoma City if he pleases, but it is a very substantial increase. The clearings every week of Oklahoma City are nearly $4,000,000. The clearings of Kansas City show an increase of 43.8 per cent, and the clearings of Kansas City are $75,000,000 a week. Let us see where these cities are that had an increase. St. Louis had an increase; Kansas City, Baltimore, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Houston, Memphis, Fort Worth, Richmond, Washington, D. C., Wichita, and Oklahoma City. It shows that in the great Central West of this country business is on the increase to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I do not desire in any way to unduly cripple debate, but manifestly we ought not under the five-minute rule to be going outside the scope of the bill. There has been a speech both pro and con on this matter. Without desiring to interfere with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I shall have to insist hereafter, with a view to expediting the disposition of the bill, that the debate be confined to the bill. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Illinois should speak five minutes. I have no desire to make my point personal.

Mr. MADDEN. I think, however, inasmuch as this debate has gone so far afield, Mr. Chairman, there ought not to be any restriction now on this particular item of the bill. However, I shall confine myself to the bill. We are dealing with war, munitions of war, and preparations for war——

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that I have no objection to his having five minutes. I am trying to be fair. I want to get this bill through.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, that is all right. I do not want the gentleman to understand that I think he wishes to be otherwise than fair.

I want to suggest to the House, Mr. Chairman, that if I had my way—and I do not expect that I shall have my way—I would use every power in the Government of the United States to protect every citizen of the United States, no matter where he is, but I would not use the power of the United States to protect the investment of a citizen of the United States outside of continental United States and its possessions. [Applause.] I believe we ought to encourage business at home and prosperity at home by compelling our people to invest their money at home, where they have the right to the protection of the flag.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Just for a question, because the gentleman has made a very interesting distinction.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why should you use the powers of the Government, not to protect investments outside of continental United States, and by implication use them to protect investments within continental United States?

Mr. MADDEN. I think that every man who lives within the United States, who is a citizen of the United States, investing his money in the United States and paying taxes to maintain the Government of the United States, and to promote the welfare of the United States, is entitled to every protection that the Government of the United States can give him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps I used the wrong word and misled the gentleman. The gentleman said "continental America."

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I meant continental United States and its possessions. But when a man begins to feel that he must go beyond the borders of his own country to make investments, and expects the Government of the United States to follow him with the flag and with the Army and with the Navy, he is expecting that which he ought not to receive. As a citizen of the United States, entitled to every protection that his citizenship justifies, every power within the Government of the United States should be placed at his disposal; but I would once for all discourage men from going into foreign countries, where the laws are not certain, for the purpose of speculation, and then expecting this Government to stand behind them with a gun.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then the gentleman is not in sympathy with the agitation in certain quarters in this country that the United States ought to use its Army and Navy to protect American investments in Mexico?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. MADDEN. I never have been and never will be in favor of that, and I do not believe it is any part of the business of the President of the United States or of the Congress of the United States to indicate who the head of the Government of Mexico is to be. I believe we should confine ourselves in our politics to saying who shall govern the people of this country, and not embroil every man, woman, and child in America by endeavoring to dictate the domestic policies of any other country. And I hope that in the present crisis the President of the United States will reiterate his warning to the people of America, not only those who live here and not attempting to do business abroad to maintain the strictest neutrality, but that he will call attention to those who, in their desire for gain, sail into dangerous seas, publicly declared by the belligerent nations to be war zones, should do so at their own peril, and should not rely for protection in their hazardous undertakings on our country, and thereby help to emphasize the neutrality of the United States, and enable us to keep at peace with all the world. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ADAIR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 2642) entitled "An act authorizing the President to reinstate Joseph Eliot Austin as an ensign in the United States Navy," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PERKINS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 21318) entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARMAMENT OF FORTIFICATIONS.

For purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $450,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $300,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Amend, on page 4, line 21, by striking out "$450,000" and inserting "$900,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, we have on hand or building or authorized 852 field guns. What we are aiming at under the so-called Greble Board report is 1,292 guns, so that we are now 440 guns short. That is the Greble Board estimate, the one which has been adopted, the one which the committee is aiming to meet. Now, Gen. Wotherspoon's estimate is 2,834 guns, or 2,000 more guns than we now have. But let us first look at the situation on the basis of the Greble Board estimate and see what we lack. We are short 440 guns of the supply recommended by the Greble Board. How long would it take to make 440 guns if we had unlimited appropriations?

On December 4, 1913, Gen. Wood testified that the entire capacity of this country, working night and day, is 500 guns in one year. That number could be turned out if we had unlimited appropriations. Now, as the gentleman from Kentucky said a little while ago, it is very clear that if we are not to have war for 15 years, we are going ahead quite as fast as we ought to go. If, on the other hand, we are going to have war in one year, we are not going ahead fast enough. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that at the rate at which we are going, according to Gen. Crozier, the rate at which he asked us to go and the committee asks us to go, it will take six years to complete the Greble Board project. I ask whether it is good judgment to go ahead so slowly that it will take us six years to acquire the full number of guns which every one admits that we ought to have as an accumulation.

Next, let us see whether the Greble Board's estimate is ample. The Greble Board's estimate calls for only 1,292 guns, whereas Gen. Wotherspoon's estimate calls for 2,834 guns. In commenting on Gen. Wotherspoon's estimate, the gentleman from Kentucky says quite properly that the information which we have as to what is going on in Europe is very recent and very incomplete. We can not, as he points out, come to conclusions based on such insufficient information as we have from the European war. Nevertheless, we can not altogether reject authentic information. We have reports that the European combatants are firing away artillery ammunition at a preposterous rate. According to Gen. Crozier's testimony, one report—I think it was Lieut. Hunsaker's—told of a battery which for four successive days fired 600 rounds a day for each gun. Think what that means. It means 2,400 rounds for each gun in four days. It means that three of those guns in a single day fired away as much ammunition as Uncle Sam can produce in a day. Uncle Sam can produce from 1,600 to 1,800 rounds per day at the outside.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says that the capacity of the United States for one day is 1,800 rounds. Does the gentleman mean the Government, or the private plants engaged in the manufacture of ammunition?

Mr. GARDNER. The 1,600 to 1,800 rounds estimate was for the Government plant. Gen. Wood's evidence was that we could produce 350,000 rounds in the first six months of war from all sources, including the Government plant. The testimony can be found on page 14 of the fortifications hearings last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not take into account the increase in the private establishments since the European war?

Mr. GARDNER. No; the Secretary of War wrote me on December 23, 1914, that he could not give me information as to this increased capacity. He said, however, that it appeared that Gen. Wood had overestimated and that 1,400 rounds per day about represented Uncle Sam's capacity to turn out artillery ammunition. But this amendment relates to guns, not to ammunition.

We have discussed a little this question of the adequacy of the reports which have been received from officers and others in Europe. Perhaps they may be incomplete, but at all events we have complete reports of the Russo-Japanese war. I find that in the battle of Mukden alone Russia had 1,204 guns engaged, and yet we have only 588 guns, built and building, in the entire country. Japan had 922 guns engaged in that same battle of Mukden.

On page 13 of the hearings held in December, 1913, on the fortifications bill for that year, it appears that at that time, roughly speaking, Russia had 6,000 guns; Germany, 5,000 guns; France, 4,800 guns. That testimony was offered long before the European war broke out. So you can see that when it is said that Gen. Wotherspoon takes an exaggerated view of the situation, at all events, as compared to foreigners, his recommendations are particularly modest. My reason for specifying the sum of $900,000, instead of $450,000, to be appropriated for artillery, is that $900,000 is the amount which was asked for last year by the Bureau of Ordnance.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] presents no new question to this Congress. The mobile artillery is supplied from funds carried in the Army and in the fortification bills. The matter was very thoroughly thrashed out in consideration of the Army bill, and this House then gave its approval to an appropriation that contemplated the finishing of the project in the Greble Board report within six years.

The Committee on Fortifications has made a recommendation of the amount that will be in accord with the policy approved by the House in connection with the Army bill. I do not desire to detain the House in any elaborate discussion of this matter, because it has been very thoroughly considered not only this year but in previous years.

The gentleman from Massachusetts gave correctly the figures touching the guns that have been appropriated for. We have appropriated for 213 batteries of four guns each, and we have remaining 110 batteries of four guns each to supply. The present item will provide for the making of one battery of 3-inch guns and for the making of four ammunition batteries, and then, under the item which is carried touching the alteration of the 3.2-inch guns into 3-inch guns, funds are provided for the conversion of four such batteries.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Is not there one battery of 3.8-inch howitzers—I mean the one new battery—to be made out of the $450,000 appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I was mistaken. It was one 3.8-inch howitzer and four 3-inch gun batteries that are to be altered into 3-inch guns.

But, Mr. Chairman, without going into the details of that, I desire simply to say that I took occasion to read some of the old debates in connection with the fortifications bill. That bill has never been a political bill and ought never to be. I read it not with the idea of raising any political issue, but with the idea of ascertaining what had been the thought of those who went before me touching the matter. I found that the original project had contemplated 1 gun for 1,000 rifles and sabers. Then it was 2 guns, and then it was 3.16 guns. The present project is 3.16 guns for 1,000 rifles and sabers. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks it should be 5 for each 1,000 rifles and sabers, and that predicated on an Army of 500,000 men. The gentleman from Massachusetts thinks it ought to be predicated on a larger Army.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I am taking Gen. Wotherspoon's opinion. I am not giving my opinion. He thinks an army of 205,000 Regulars, or 800,000 men in all, would be necessary; that is, he counts on 600,000 reserves and militia.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not mean a standing army of 500,000, and I do not think anybody misunderstood me, because it has been so much discussed that they know what I meant. It means an army considered requisite in order to properly meet a force that it is assumed a first-class power could land on our shores, assuming they had control of the seas. That army was figured roughly at 500,000. When you work out the details of their figures and the detail of the guns, not only for the United States but the insular possessions, it runs considerably above that.

But I am not going to undertake now to go into the details of the matter. We acted upon the Greble Board report, which is the only report we have on the matter, or rather the last report on the matter. We did not accept simply the fact expressed by Gen. Wotherspoon. Whether that view be wise or unwise is a matter of opinion. I think the general showed his zeal in all of these matters, as I said earlier, only when he was leaving the War Department, and if that be his present, fixed opinion, it may or may not agree with the opinions of other men; but our committee felt we were making very rapid progress considering the past. This is a matter that was much neglected for a number of years. The situation I think was rather bad, to put it mildly, and the committee in the recent past has strained a point to make liberal allowances for the guns and the ammunition. When we come to the ammunition I may call attention the very rapid increases that have been made in the past few years, jumping from the usual appropriation of about $150,000 to $300,000 in the 1912 bill, then $600,000 in the 1913 bill, then $900,000 in the 1914 bill, then $1,200,000 in the 1915 bill. We are now proposing to go at a rate which will complete the supply of guns within six years. If I shared the viewpoint of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I should not offer an amendment doubling the amount, but I should offer an amendment which would carry a sum sufficient to supply the maximum amount that could be manufactured within the year.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment there?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. Not sharing his viewpoint and having in mind the relative value of things——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. And having in mind the risk proposed to be provided against, I think we are making very good progress in this branch of the service, particularly when you consider the men that you have to use the material that you are proposing to supply and the time that it takes to get men properly drilled so as to be able to use such equipment. I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I was going to call the gentleman's attention to a matter of which he spoke a moment ago. He said that if he entertained my viewpoint he would offer an amendment for a much more substantial sum. I am only offering an amendment which was equal to the estimate made by the War Department last year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, of course I do not know the basis on which the gentleman acts.

Mr. GARDNER. I so stated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps I should put that in another way. I do not know the reason that makes him adopt the basis that he takes for his action; but manifestly I would not be controlled in a present appropriation by what was asked for the year before, because I would have in mind something that has been done during the year.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman last year turned them down and gave them only $450,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. And they are $450,000 better off than they were last year, and they are therefore not now necessarily needing to ask for $450,000 more.

Mr. GARDNER. On that basis you would never complete it.

Mr. SHERLEY. We never will. There never will be a completion of any of these things. The gentleman had considerable quarrel, and he thought a good deal of fun with Gen. Crozier's testimony because Gen. Crozier had stated that they had figured on a six years' completion last year, and as there was no reason for changing that viewpoint he figured on a six years' completion this year. The gentleman intimated that at that rate we would always be six years away from completion, but it is also true that the degree we would be away from completion would be so slight as to have to be figured in parts of a gun after a number of years. We are making substantial progress in this matter and are proceeding very much more rapidly than we ever have in the past. In view of the fact that this matter was thoroughly discussed heretofore and the House expressed its clear conviction by an overwhelming vote on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts during the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, I do not feel that I am justified in further detaining the committee now.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has an amendment pending now.

Mr. GARDNER. This is an amendment to the amendment. I do that for the purpose of asking the gentleman if he will tell us whether an ammunition battery has as a matter of fact a complete cannon in it?

Mr. SHERLEY. It has one spare gun.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it all in condition to mount or is it simply separate parts to make up one unit?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have an actual gun, speaking now of the gun as distinguished from the carriage. They also have spare parts in regard to the carriage. The gentleman will find a detailed statement about that.

Mr. GARDNER. I did not quite understand the statement. That is why I asked the question. What I want to get at is this: Suppose they make these four ammunition batteries and suppose by any chance we should have a war, would each of those batteries be able to supply a gun of its own out of the spare parts—a mounted gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not sure as to that, but in figuring the number of guns that we have we are not counting these guns at all.

Mr. GARDNER. I quite understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. They are simply that much additional reserve.

Mr. GARDNER. I was asking for my own information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not positive, and I could not tell the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $1,160,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 5, line 6, by striking out "$1,160,000" and inserting "$3,000,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, of course, is based on the same principles as its predecessor. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $300,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 10, by striking out "$300,000" and inserting "$800,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, that is an amendment which, if adopted, would provide sufficient money to begin the armament of the fortifications at Cape Henry. Inasmuch as the committee has refused to consider the appropriation for the construction of those fortifications, this amendment of mine is merely offered for the purpose of putting it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon, and for modernizing projectiles on hand, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $200,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 15, by striking out "$200,000" and inserting "$400,000."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary expenses of officers not occupying public quarters at the proving ground, while employed on ordnance duty thereat, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, and the compensation of draftsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, $18,700: Provided, That hereafter the occupancy by such officers, providing themselves with quarters elsewhere, of one room in the building at the proving ground locally known as the brick house shall not be construed as occupancy of public quarters within the meaning of this act and of the law authorizing allowance and commutation of quarters: Provided further, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are directed to reimburse Lieut. Col. Jay E. Hoffer, Ordnance Department, United States Army, the sum of $118, and First Lieut. Alfred H. Hobley, Ordnance Department, United States Army, the sum of $156, refunded by them to the United States on April 22 and May 21, 1914, respectively, on account of moneys received by them as commutation of quarters during part of the period June 1 to October 31, 1913, from the appropriation from which payment was originally made and to which the funds were credited when refunded.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understand this new provision is to make an arrangement for a peculiar condition existing at Sandy Hook whereby the officers only occupy one room and not to consider that one room if occupied in the so-called brick house as really officers' quarters.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true. It is simply to confirm what has been the practice there for a good many years which a recent ruling of the comptroller made necessary. I think the system that is in vogue there is a system that promotes to a very great degree the efficiency of the Ordnance Department. These men are practically at school even when they are not working.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the department has recommended this paragraph for several years, but the committee has not heretofore reported it.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; that has not been recommended before and never was necessary before, because there has never been any question raised as to the practice, but a recent ruling of the comptroller made it necessary to either get an authorization or suspend the practice, and these small sums, as the gentleman notices, are cases where the ruling of the comptroller came at such a time that it required a repayment by these men of moneys that they had been allowed and which the comptroller held were not justly allowed under existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any other similar cases where officers have been compelled to make reimbursements where they were entitled to consideration?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; because this matter only recently occurred. These are the only instances.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBMARINE MINES.

For purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them for closing the channels leading to our principal seaports, and for continuing torpedo experiments, $190,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, as soon as they bring in a map I want to ask a question about the fortification of the Pacific coast. I want to ask for some information, and I think this is a very proper place to do it under the head of submarine mines. In the Straits of Juan de Fuca the waters here are very deep and the current so swift that it is impossible to use these submarine mines. I want to call attention to the fact that while there is a fort at the entrance to Puget Sound there is nothing to protect Bellingham, which is situated about 90 miles north from Seattle. Now, when you come down the Pacific coast, starting at the Straits of Juan de Fuca, you come to the mouth of the Columbia River. I think there are some mines there. Coming on down to San Francisco, almost 1,000 miles farther, you find fortifications there. Coming on down to Los Angeles, about 400 or 500 miles farther, you find some fortifications there, but up here at Grays Harbor and also at Willapa Harbor it is absolutely unprotected, and at Bellingham also it is unprotected. Now, the question I would like to know is, what is the advantage of having fortifications under a situation of that character? For instance, here at Bellingham are two great transcontinental railroads, and the largest battleship fleet could come to the wharves without coming within 15 miles of any gun. They could have control of these two transcontinental railroads. They have fine roads from there down to Seattle, reaching to Portland and all that country, and I wondered what was the benefit of having any fortifications where you leave the other places open and entirely unfortified. The same condition exists at Grays Harbor and Willapa Harbor, which are totally undefended.

None of these fortifications on Puget Sound or elsewhere on that portion of the coast could protect themselves from an attack from the land. All the guns on Puget Sound are absolutely useless in a land attack, and I have wondered whether it was not an absolute waste of money to spend it on these fortifications and leave open our defenses at these other places. I want to know what is the theory of protecting the coast in spots. It does seem to me it would be about as effective as it would be to chain up a mad dog with the loose link in a broken chain. I have taken the matter up on different occasions with the department, but the answer I have always received heretofore was that Bellingham and these other towns which are unfortified need not be uneasy because they would not be attacked in case of war.

But recent events have demonstrated that that was an error. I remember I took the matter up on two occasions and called attention to the fact, not on my own information, because I am not an engineer and know nothing whatever about military affairs; but out in the harbor of Bellingham there is an island especially well located, according to engineers, to be fortified, where the guns could not only protect the Straits of Juan de Fuca, but also that harbor. I have never been able to get any satisfactory information as to why this island is not fortified. I should like to know if the gentleman can tell me what the theory is? I see my friend, Capt. HOBSON, here. I should like to know, and our people out there would like to know, on what theory it is argued that we are protected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to set out in my speech during general debate what the purpose is of seacoast fortifications, as I understood it. And very briefly it was this, that it was not contemplated to protect all coast cities or to protect all the coast, but that they were contemplated to protect certan harbors and certain cities where the importance warranted such protection, the protection of the harbors being with two ideas in view, one that they might be used as a safe rendezvous for our own fleet and the other that they should not be used as a rendezvous for an enemy's fleet and as a base of supplies for any mobile army of an enemy that might be landed.

Now, I am not sufficiently familiar with the topography of the country, to which the gentleman has just alluded, to answer him as to just what particular function the particular ports of Puget Sound are supposed to perform. I do know in a general way there is both an outer and an inner defense there. I do also know that what the gentleman stated as to the difficulty of putting mines in some of those waters, on account of their great depth and the current, is correct. While they are still experimenting, they have not yet come to a satisfactory result. And the Taft Board report contemplated as a part of the defense of Puget Sound the aid by the Navy in the way of submarines and other craft.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is one reason why I wanted to bring it to the gentleman's attention and to the attention of the committee. Upon the Pacific coast we have practically no submarines as yet. We have very few torpedo-boat destroyers. They have no battleships and have not had them. We have never had any battleships around there but once, when they came around on that fleeting visit and stayed a few days and then disappeared. And as we do not have the coast fortifications and the harbors could not be mined, I want to call attention to just how helpless we are.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are very superior fortifications up on Puget Sound.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I probably was indefinite in my expression. I mean that we have no coast fortifications at Bellingham and at these two exposed harbors on the coast.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are a number of harbors and a number of cities—I do not know the number—that are not protected by fortifications—a majority of them. It is not anticipated they will ever be protected, not only on the Pacific but on the Atlantic.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On the Atlantic coast the situation is somewhat different, because there they have a large number of submarines, and I imagine that most of the harbors can be mined. We have not the submarines out there, and you can not use the mines.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, I am not in a position to go afield as to the question of whether there should be submarines stationed on the Pacific coast or not, and I do not feel that I ought now to go into the question as to the number we should have. I want to say to the gentleman for his additional information that the Taft Board project contemplated some additional armament for that part of the western coast, and, as I stated in the general debate, I very much hope, although it is a great task, that by next year we shall have some detailed report touching the particular fortifications on both coasts, and at that time the Fortifications Committee may be better prepared to give the gentleman detailed information. At one time I went very thoroughly into that matter, but it has been some years since I did so, and I should not like to trust my memory now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I have two minutes more, inasmuch as I yielded to the gentleman, and which I was very glad to do?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to add this statement, that I am very glad to bring to the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky and to the members of the committee the situation on the Pacific coast. We are hoping for better things, but I think it is now perfectly apparent to anyone who has given attention to the matter now and during the time the naval bill was under consideration that we are practically without any defense upon that coast. Here is Puget Sound, that can not be mined, that is without torpedo-boat destroyers, without submarines, and without fortifications with which to protect that portion of the coast, and where they can come right in and seize these two great transcontinental railways and come down the coast and capture all these great coast cities of the Northwest. While we from the Pacific coast have always voted for fortifications and for the Navy, and expect to continue to do so, I feel it is my duty and privilege now to call attention to the fact that the Pacific coast is practically helpless. We are not prepared for war. We are not prepared to defend ourselves. If we should have war on the Pacific coast to-morrow we would be helpless. They could land, and would undoubtedly land, and take those cities, and we might just as well face that fact. I am not stating it as an alarmist. I am calling your attention to the fact that the condition exists, so that if you wake up some day and war is declared you will be prepared for what is going to happen, because you are going to lose the Pacific coast cities.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to have go unchallenged the statement that the Pacific coast is not at all fortified. I hold in my hand a book that contains information as to the fortifications at every place in the United States and in every insular possession. Manifestly there is a lot of this information that ought not to be made public and, so far as I am concerned, will not be made public. But I speak of having it in order that I may not be considered as speaking without some knowledge of the matter. The fortifications of the Columbia River and at Puget Sound are exceedingly elaborate. As I stated, they contemplated in one instance the protection of not only the outer entrance but, because of the importance of the harbor, there is an inner line of defense; and while what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has said is true as to the difficulty of mining certain of those waters, it does not follow by any means that the fortifications out there are negligible or that the Pacific coast is subject to any sort of invasion, no matter how slight the force.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is entirely correct, so far as the fortifications of Puget Sound are concerned. I think they are probably the best in the country. The point I was making—and I might make another point—was that there is another way of coming into Seattle by way of Bellingham that is not fortified, although they may have put one small gun there recently. But wherever the fortifications are I admit that they would do some good.

Mr. SHERLEY. It must be borne in mind—and I have stated it so often that I think everyone must appreciate it by now—that the fortifications were not planned with the idea of protecting all the coast from an invasion. The defense of the country against a landing party is a mobile-army proposition. The fortifications will have served their purpose when they shall have protected a given area, and when they are of sufficient magnitude as to require an enemy to land in order to effect their capture.

Now, I could recite numerous towns along the Atlantic, as well as along the Pacific coast, where there are no fortifications, and where, assuming control of the sea and the desire of an enemy's fleet to do it, they could lie off the shore and bombard those coast cities. But some things are taken as the necessary risks in war. It is not expected that you could prevent any sort of damage to your country. What is undertaken to be done by fortifications is to prevent either the use of harbors or such damage to the places of first magnitude as would not be considered a proper and a to-be-expected loss in case of war.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Just a moment. I hope my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will give that matter of the Bellingham proposition some study between now and the next bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I shall have occasion to consider fortification bills again. If I do, I hope I shall give it, as well as other matters, my best attention.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] did not feel content to allow the statement of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] as to the defenses of the entrances of Puget Sound to go unchallenged, I do not feel inclined to allow the general inference from his statement that the Pacific coast is well defended to go unchallenged. No apologies could make out a case of any standing for the security of the Pacific coast. A number of assumed conditions of war have been worked out at the war colleges. One condition was that if an Asiatic nation in control of the sea making war upon us without wishing to disturb its shipping to India, Australasia, or to Europe, using for transportation of troops only the vessels engaged in trade with America. It was assumed that all the militia, as well as the Regular Army, available in our country were mobilized, with a concentration and cooperation that would really be impossible in war time. Giving our country the advantage of every possible doubt, the war was fought through, and within 60 days the enemy had landed just where my friend from Washington pointed out, had sent an expedition down those roads and taken all the important cities in the Puget Sound region. Simultaneously another expedition had landed at Monterey, and by operating in the rear had taken the fortifications and the city of San Francisco. It proved absolutely impossible for us to make any effective resistance.

What I have cited is a good illustration of the condition of the Pacific coast and of our coasts generally. Without a mobile army, as the gentleman from Kentucky has pointed out, and having such a vast coast line, it is impossible to provide an adequate defense from coast fortifications, even where they are efficient. Without control of the sea we may as well realize that we are at the mercy of any first-class military power.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For land defenses in the Hawaiian Islands, including the procurement and installation of searchlights and the acquisition of land and rights of way, $150,000.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I understood from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] some time ago that he had some observations that he desired to offer to the committee with respect to the fortifications of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated that I hoped to have here a statement with regard to those fortifications. It has not yet arrived, so I am advised, and under leave to extend my remarks I will put it in the RECORD. I stated in a general way that I did not agree with the gentleman, but I did not feel then, and I should not like now, to go into the details of it when I can give to the committee something that is so much better than my statement and which will be accurate as to all the details; and inasmuch as the matter is not involved in any proposed legislation, as I understand it, I presume that will be the better course.

Mr. MILLER. Well, Mr. Chairman, not having the statement before us, of course anything like a discussion of what it contains is like talking blindly in the dark. From the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], made in general debate, however, I gathered that it is his intention to put in the RECORD a statement from the board that has control finally of these coast-defense matters—these fortification matters.

I do not know what the board will say. I have nothing to say about it except to call attention to that method, which I do not think is a very good one, but which very likely is the only one that can now be followed. It is the vice and the curse of the bureaucratic method wherever found. A matter comes up through the regular channel, and the final place in the bureau questions the efficiency or accuracy of the report, or the recommendations, or the advisability or wisdom of them. Then it sends back through the same channel, to the same man who originated the scheme, and asks him if he thinks that is a good scheme.

Of course there is but one answer to be expected, and there is but one answer that will be received. I think I can predict in advance about what the statement will be. It will be that the fortifications in the Philippine Islands are on islands; that it is one of their main elements of strength; and that there is no necessity for constructing any fortifications or protecting works on the land. Now, that is exactly what they did about Hawaii—absolutely the same identical thing—and about the protection of Pearl Harbor, and if they are full and complete in the report which they send, the statement will contain an exact account of their attitude toward the fortifications in Hawaii identical with their attitude toward the same problem in the Philippine Islands. But when they thought a critical test was likely to come they found it necessary to change their ideas respecting the Hawaiian Islands, recommended and received last year a large appropriation for land defenses, and we have further evidence of it in the paragraph just read. If I am correct in my recollection, last year's bill carried about $550,000, and this carries a further item of $150,000, making a total of about $700,000, a very large sum, and one that will be sufficient to provide ample land defenses.

They have the same problem in the Philippine Islands, if they will only admit it; and they do admit it in this bill, and the hearings admit it practically, when they say they are going to send four mortars of an earlier type to protect Corregidor from a land attack. That is what the hearings say. I do not think any military man will say—though I do not think any man who studied the conditions there will say—that the four mortars will be a sufficient protection to Corregidor Island from a land attack.

Now, the gentleman has correctly stated that when these fortifications were constructed it was thought that their location on islands was a source of great strength, and it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. I should like three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. When those fortifications were planned and constructed it was thought that no gun could be mounted on the land on either wing of sufficient carrying power to reach those islands and those fortifications; but now they know, because they have tried it; and if they have not tried it, common sense would tell them, from the experience of the warring nations during the past five months, that it is a simple feat to mount guns on either wing that will command the fortifications all along the line of the islands excepting El Fraile. They can not reach El Fraile, thank God; but they can reach and command every gun on Corregidor and on Caballo; and on Carabao it is just like throwing apples at a cow. You could not miss it if you tried.

The gentleman seems to think that my suggestions relative to these fortifications came from some officer there. They do not come from one officer. Let no stigma be cast upon one man by the insinuation of the gentleman from Kentucky, saying he has been overruled by his superiors and therefore probably he was in error. It is the word of every man who built the fortifications with whom I conversed—and I tried to converse with all the officers superintending the physical construction of these elaborate fortifications—that the features I have mentioned are features of marked weakness or of doubtful efficiency. Some of these features these officers, almost with their very souls and hearts in their voices, had pleaded should be changed, but their recommendations were turned down by a board which now, I presume, will bring in a report, handed in in the bureaucratic, official way by the very distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, saying that the recommendations of these men who know, who were there on the ground, were not well made, and therefore should not be followed. In passing let me add that of all the military men I have ever met I consider Col. Ruckman, who had charge of the construction work of these elaborate fortifications, one of the most highly skilled in military science and one whose judgment on matters within his realm would be second to none.

Now, I do not suppose there is anything of immediate value to be gained by a discussion of this item, but I will tell you one thing. I make a little prediction—that within a short period of time the gentleman's committee will report out an item for the correction of these fortifications in the Philippine Islands, just as it has done in respect to Hawaii. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition touching the land defenses of the Hawaiian Islands and the land defenses of the islands in Manila Bay are manifestly very different, for one basic reason. The fortifications at Honolulu and at Pearl Harbor are on an island of very great extent, where it is possible to land at numerous points outside the range of the fortifications, and to attempt the reduction of those fortifications from the rear. Necessarily a project had to be worked out for such land defense. That project has been worked out. It went through many stages of evolution, and finally resulted in a series of fortifications in the shape somewhat of a crescent, taking advantage of the topography of the land and a range of hills, with the points of the crescent practically at Pearl Harbor at one end and Honolulu at the other.

The fortifications in Manila Bay consist of those on Corregidor Island, an island of considerable size, on Caballo Island,

Carabao Island, and El Fraile. El Fraile is so small that it corresponds in size about to a battleship, and when completed will be very much like an armored battleship, with heavy armament, and with the guns mounted in turrets. The idea has never been that we could permanently hold the Philippine Islands in the event of the loss of the sea and the landing of any considerable force in those islands, but it was and is contemplated that if necessary Corregidor could be held for quite an indefinite time, and if at the outbreak of the war we should not have any aid from an American fleet, Corregidor could keep the flag flying until such time as aid might come.

These islands were chosen because as islands they had a marked advantage over the mainland in that they were not subject to subjection by direct land assault. The scheme was very carefully worked out, and considerable attention was given to the danger that the fortifications might be in from fire from the shore. Of course, it is not contemplated that no effort would be made by a mobile army stationed in the Philippines, and by mobile artillery, to hold some of these heights that overlook the islands.

But assuming that our force was dislodged and their position occupied by a hostile force, it is still thought that protection should be had against such hostile force. Manifestly mobile artillery on those shores would be better than permanent fortifications, better because of the fact that it would be mobile, and therefore adaptable somewhat to the circumstances presented by the attacking force, and also because, in case of defeat, it would not necessarily fall into the enemy's hands to be used by them against the island fortifications.

But, in addition to that, the armaments of the fortifications cover a very great part of the terrain on either side; it is covered by some of the guns, and to a large extent by the mortars, and now it is proposed to put an additional number of mortars on Caballo Island to aid further in defense against land attack.

The gentleman states that these mortars are to be old, worn-out mortars. I do not know where he gets that information, because the bill carries an item for the actual building of these mortars, and therefore they will not be old and worn out, but will be newly built.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The hearing states that these are four mortars and states where they are to be taken from in the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is unfortunately confusing the mortars in connection with the Hawaiian Islands with the mortars for the Philippines.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I refer to the hearings where it is stated that the mortars are to be taken and placed on Caballo Island as a defense, not to the attack of ships, but for the fortification against a land attack, and uses those words, and the amount of $110,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. The answer to that is that we carry $110,000 in this bill to build them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. They are going to be mortars having a range of nineteen thousand and some-odd yards, or a little less than 11 miles, instead of being mortars with a range of about 7 miles, as the gentleman from Minnesota stated.

Now, I could not in the absence of a map which I have not available, point out the various islands and the relation they bear to each other. It may be, as the gentleman making a prophecy states, that something will come in in the nature of an additional proposal for the fortifications in the Philippines. It would not surprise me at all, and would not indicate that the gentleman's present position is right. All I desire to impress on the committee is that this matter was not hastily entered into, the conclusions finally drawn were the result of much thought, they were not immature, they were not simply the result of a bureaucratic or autocratic governmental action. Officers here had not simply undertaken to put their will against the thought of the officers on the ground.

The officers on the ground made a number of recommendations, some of which have been acquiesced in. The officer who had much to do with the recommendations acquiesced in was Capt. Embick, who is now in Washington, but in making the plans he went out on the ground and, instead of giving merely a few days to it, studied weeks there. He was detailed there with other officers.

Now, I submit to the committee and the House that we have a right to assume, notwithstanding the views expressed by the gentleman as the result of his trip and conversation with certain officers, that the fortifications that are erected and to be erected are adequate. Certainly I would not feel warranted in declining to go forward by virtue of the suggestions made as to the futility of these fortifications.

In considering these island fortifications it might be well to call to gentlemen's minds the history of Fort Sumter. That was a fortification on an island of less than 30 acres. It was bombarded by a fleet for two years and, though garrisoned with only about 300 men and subject to attack from shore batteries, held out for this long period.

I submit herewith memorandum from Capt. Embick touching these fortifications, in accordance with the promise I earlier made. I also, under leave to print, submit the report of the Committee on Fortifications:

Memorandum for the Chief of Coast Artillery.

WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, February 24, 1915.

1. Representative SHERLEY, chairman of the subcommittee on Fortifications, House of Representatives, has called attention to the remarks made yesterday on the floor of the House relative to the defenses of Manila Bay and has asked that a general statement in regard to these defenses be furnished him.

2. The first project for the seacoast defense for the entrance to Manila Bay was contained in the report of a board of Engineer and Artillery officers convened upon recommendation of the Chief of Engineers. This project, which was approved by the Secretary of War on February 4, 1902, contemplated the installation of heavy guns and mortars on (1) Mariveles shore, (2) Corregidor Island, (3) Caballo Island, and (4) the south shore of Manila Bay, and also of smaller guns on Carabao Island.

3. The next project for these defenses was a preliminary one, submitted by the National Coast Defense Board on January 11, 1906, which called for the installation of the seacoast armament on (1) the Mariveles shore, (2) Corregidor Island, (3) Caballo Island, and (4) the south shore of Manila Bay. Subsequently to this report Gen. J. P. Story, a member of the National Coast Defense Board, was designated as a committee of one to visit Manila Bay and other localities in the insular possessions for the purpose of perfecting the projects of that board for such localities. Gen. Story was assisted in his investigations by the commanding general, Philippine Division, and other officers stationed in the Philippine Islands, all of whom concurred in the view that the occupation of the south shore of the bay as a site for seacoast batteries was inadvisable on account of the exposure of such site to direct land attack, and that in lieu thereof these batteries should be emplaced on Carabao and El Fraile Islands.

4. Subsequently to the report of the National Coast Defense Board there arose a number of questions in connection with the installation of seacoast batteries at Manila and Subic Bays. With a view to arriving at a decision as to these questions, the Secretary of War, in September, 1907, appointed a board of officers consisting of Lieut. Col. F. V. Abbot, Corps of Engineers, and the undersigned, to visit the Philippine Islands and to investigate and report on all questions connected with seacoast defense that were then under consideration by the department. Having completed its duties, this board, on January 17, 1908, submitted a report to the War Department, which report was concurred in by the commanding general, Philippine Division. In this report it was recommended that all the seacoast armament for the defense of Manila Bay be located on the four islands lying at the entrance, and that the armament that the National Coast Defense Board had proposed for Lasisi Point be emplaced on Corregidor Island instead.

5. Upon the receipt of this report the Secretary of War convened a board consisting of the Chief of Staff, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of Engineers, the Chief of Coast Artillery, and the president of the Army War College, for the final determination of the projects for both Manila and Subic Bays. This latter board concurred in the view that no armament should be emplaced on Lasisi Point on account of its exposure to land attack and adopted a project for Manila Bay that is substantially in accord with the present project.

6. So far as known to the undersigned the wisdom of not occupying any portion of the mainland as a site for seacoast defenses has not been seriously questioned by anyone. The reason for this is that such fortifications installed on the mainland would be open not only to the objection which obtains in the case of the Corregidor batteries—that is, of being capable of being commanded by an enemy's batteries located on the higher neighboring hills—but also to the graver objection of being exposed to capture by direct assault by a land force, an objection which does not obtain in the case of fortifications on the islands. Under the adopted project, therefore, the defense against occupancy of the mainland by the heavy guns of an enemy is intrusted to the mobile forces in the Philippine Islands, supported and supplemented by the fire of the seacoast armament on the fortified islands. Much of the armament now installed on these islands has a range of over 8½ miles, and the item in the pending fortification bill for armament for the insular possessions is to cover the construction of mortars that will have a range of approximately 11 miles. The plans for the land defenses of these fortifications were drawn up in the Philippine Islands, and the full amount of the estimates asked therefor was appropriated by Congress. All of the armament supplied for these defenses was not, however, of the latest type, as, for example, the 5-inch rifles and the 7-inch howitzers. The armament of this character that was provided was of the model 1898; that is, the type just preceding those now being manufactured. In range and ballistic power these guns are equal to those of the present type, and they are inferior thereto only in mobility and rate of fire. Inferiority in these respects is not regarded as of importance in this particular case, as the guns are to be fired from fixed emplacements, and the necessity for conserving even the most liberal supply of ammunition during the continuance of a siege would preclude advantage being taken of the higher rate of fire of the guns of the present type.

STANLEY D. EMBICK,
Captain, Coast Artillery Corps,
Assistant to Chief of Coast Artillery.

[House Report No. 1416, Sixty-third Congress, third session.]

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 21491:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the accompanying bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates on which the bill is based aggregate $6,193,641.32, which sum includes $5,863,641.32 submitted in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1916 and $330,000 submitted in House Document No. 1529. The accompanying bill appropriates $6,060,216.90, which amount is $432,516.90 more than was appropriated for the same purposes at the last session of Congress, and $133,424.42 less than the estimates submitted.

During the Forty-ninth Congress (fiscal years 1887 and 1888) no appropriations were made on account of fortifications, their maintenance and armament, and for the 12 fiscal years 1875 to 1886, inclusive, the appropriations by Congress on this account averaged only $540,750 per annum, and only $463,500 per annum for the 14 years, including 1887 and 1888, for which latter two fiscal years no specific appropriations were made, as stated.

The bill reported herewith contains appropriations in continuance of the policy adopted by the Fiftieth Congress in the passage of the acts approved September 22, 1888, and March 2, 1889, and continued at the succeeding terms of Congress in acts approved August 18, 1890, February 24, 1891, July 23, 1892, February 18, 1893, August 1, 1894, March 2, 1895, June 6, 1896, March 3, 1897, May 7, 1898, March 3, 1899, May 25, 1900, March 1, 1901, June 6, 1902, March 3, 1903, April 21, 1904, March 3, 1905, June 25, 1906, March 2, 1907, May 27 1908, March 3, 1909, June 23, 1910, March 4, 1911, June 6, 1912, February 13 1913, and June 27, 1914.

The appropriations by said acts for the 27 fiscal years 1889–1915 aggregate $152,584,696.72, of which sum $131,597,432.72 was appropriated for the United States and $20,987,264 for the insular possessions, an average of $5,651,285.06 per annum.

The fortifications appropriation acts enacted during the Fifty-fifth Congress (fiscal years 1899 and 1900) appropriated $14,287,396, in addition to which amount sums aggregating $8,674,898 were provided in deficiency appropriation acts for fortifications and the armament thereof, and the further sum of $13,049,751.86 was allotted for the same objects from the general appropriation of $50,000,000 made for the national defense in the act of March 9, 1898, making in all $36,012,045.86 available for fortifications and the armament thereof under appropriations made during the Fifty-fifth Congress. In addition to the above, the sum of $2,500 was appropriated for fortification purposes in the act making appropriations for the support of the Army dated September 22, 1888; $35,000 by the act making appropriations for the support of the Army dated March 2, 1901; $259,200 by the act making appropriations for the support of the Army dated June 30, 1902; and $389,000 by the act making appropriations for the support of the Army dated March 2, 1903; total, $685,700.

There was also appropriated by the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government approved April 28, 1904, $591,046.25; under the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government approved March 3, 1905, $40,000; under the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government approved June 30, 1906, $158,953.75; by the deficiency act of July 7, 1898, $0.70; by the deficiency act of February 14, 1902, $2.68; by the deficiency act of July 1, 1902, $4.38; and by the sundry civil act of March 4, 1911, $154,667; total, $944,674.76.

The urgent deficiency act of February 14, 1902, carried $3,000 for fortifications and the deficiency act of March 4, 1907, $977.79.

The joint resolution approved June 23, 1914, appropriated $31,000 to complete the purchase of necessary land at Cape Henry, Va.

The total appropriations made for fortifications and other works of defense since 1888, and since the recommendations of the Endicott Board of 1885, including the appropriations made in deficiency and other acts, including the Army bills dated September 22, 1888, March 2, 1901, June 30, 1902, and March 2, 1903, the sundry civil bills dated April 28, 1904, March 3, 1905, June 30, 1906, and March 4, 1911, and allotments made from the national defense fund, amount to $175,974,699.13, of which sum $154,682,768.13 was for the United States and $21,291,931 for the insular possessions, and has included the necessary cost of maintenance; $59,198.66 of the amount appropriated for the United States was expended for maintenance of submarine mines in the insular possessions.

The scheme of seacoast fortifications for the continental United States contemplated by the Endicott Board, as modified by the National Coast Defense Board (see S. Doc. No. 248, 59th Cong., 1st sess., for report), and as revised to date, it is estimated, will cost in the aggregate $159,982,534.43, of which amount the sum of $126,112,068.50 has been appropriated and $1,043,998.81 has been returned to the Treasury, a more particular discussion of the details of which will appear elsewhere in this report.

The scheme of fortifications for the insular possessions contemplated by the National Coast Defense Board, as revised to date, it is estimated, will cost in the aggregate $30,177,536.71, of which there has been appropriated the sum of $21,291,931, the details of which are also discussed more at length elsewhere herein.

The difference between the estimated whole cost of the so-called Endicott scheme of fortifications, as modified and revised to date, for continental United States, $159,982,534.43, and the appropriations made therefor to date, $126,112,068.50, less amount returned to Treasury, amounts to $33,870,465.93.

The difference between the estimated whole cost of the scheme of fortifications for the insular possessions, as revised to date, $30,177,536.71, and the appropriations already made therefor, $21,291,931, amounts to $8,885,605.71.

The difference between the combined estimated cost of both schemes, $190,160,071.14, and the combined appropriations therefor to date, $147,403,999.50, less amount returned to Treasury, amounts to $42,756,071.64.

The difference between the $147,403,999.50 already provided toward the scheme of the Endicott Board, modified by the National Coast Defense Board, and the sum total of appropriations, $175,974,699.13 for fortifications since 1888, amounting to $28,570,699.63, is represented in expenditures for erecting and equipping the gun factory at Watervliet, the gun-carriage factory at Watertown, the powder factory at Picatinny, N. J., the Ordnance and Fortification Board, the manufacture of mountain, field, and siege guns, and ammunition therefor, and for sundry other objects incident to providing and maintaining a system of seacoast defenses, and the amount returned to Treasury.

In addition to the foregoing general statement as to the history of and appropriations for the scheme of seacoast fortifications adopted by Congress in 1888 and prosecuted by annual appropriations since that year, it is deemed pertinent at this time to discuss somewhat more in detail the subject of these very considerable expenditures.

By the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, the President was directed to appoint a board to formulate plans for seacoast defenses. This board later became known under the name of the Endicott Board, and its report, transmitted to Congress on January 23, 1886, formed for many years the guide from which the Secretary of War determined the ports that should be fortified and the amount and type of armament required for each. It will be understood that these plans required many modifications of detail in accordance with the development of commercial and strategic importance of the different ports and emplacements and changes in modern armament. In addition, no provision was made for reserve ammunition, probably due to the fact that the development of satisfactory powder was at that time in an experimental stage. On March 5, 1906, the President of the United States transmitted a message to the Congress in which he inclosed a report of the National Coast Defense Board, which had been appointed by him on January 31, 1905. This report modified and brought up to date the report of the Endicott Board and added a scheme for the fortifications of the insular possessions of the United States, and is usually referred to as the Taft Board report. In pursuance of the plans and projects recommended in that report estimates are submitted annually by the Secretary of War of the sums needed to carry on the work, and the items containing such estimates constitute the bill as submitted to this committee.

It should be stated in passing that the estimates for the fortification of the Panama Canal are submitted as a part of the general canal estimates and are carried in the sundry civil bill and are not included in any of the figures used in this discussion.

These items of appropriation may be roughly divided into three general classes, namely:

1. Fortification of seacoast forts, including ammunition.
2. Supply of field artillery material, including ammunition.
3. Miscellaneous items related to the above, but not strictly forming parts thereof.

The first classification can be subdivided into three items: (a) Items pertaining to new armament and installation, including reserve ammunition. These items embrace guns, gun carriages, emplacements, sites for defense, electrical installation, searchlights, sea walls, submarine-mine structures, fire-control instruments and structures, and ammunition; (b) items pertaining to maintenance, repair, and alterations of property embraced in subdivision (a), except ammunition; and (c) items pertaining to seacoast target-practice ammunition, including appliances for same, and subdivisions (a) and (b) should also be segregated according as they relate to continental United States and the insular possessions.

Under these three subdivisions of the first general division there has been heretofore appropriated for continental United States, including practice ammunition used in the insular possessions, $126,112,068.50. Of this amount, under subdivision a, items pertaining to new armament and installation, there has been apportioned $89,013,055.59; items relating to reserve ammunition, $15,252,885.98. Under subdivision b—that is, the item for maintenance, repair, and alteration—there has been appropriated $15,113,070.12. Under subdivision c, seacoast target-practice ammunition, there has been appropriated the sum of $5,689,058. There has been covered into the Treasury unexpended $1,043,998.81.

Under subdivisions a and b there has been appropriated for the insular possessions $21,291,931. This total includes under subdivision a items pertaining to new armament and installation, $18,072,209.12; items for reserve seacoast ammunition, $2,800,000. Under subdivision b, for maintenance, repair, and alteration, there has been appropriated $419,721.88. So that the total of appropriations for both continental United States and the insular possessions, under heading No. 1, amounts to $147,403,999.50.

The second general classification, to wit: Supply of Field Artillery material, including ammunition, can also be subdivided into three classifications similar to that of item No. 1. In other words, (a) those pertaining to new material, including reserve ammunition; (b) those pertaining to maintenance, repair, and alteration; and (c) those pertaining to target-practice ammunition.

The total appropriated has been $11,880,800. The total of the above that is included under the subdivision a, new material, including reserve ammunition, is $10,388,800, of which $4,201,600 was for such reserve ammunition, leaving $6,187,200 as the amount that has been appropriated for new material. Of this latter sum, $1,005,000 is counted as being for new material, though it is literally for the purpose of making new batteries out of old ones.

Under subdivision b, for maintenance, repair, and alteration, there has been appropriated $441,000. Under subdivision c, for target-practice ammunition, there has been appropriated $1,051,000.

The third general classification, to wit, miscellaneous items related to the preceding but not strictly forming parts thereof, consists of the following items, totaling appropriations of $16,689,899.63.

Board of Ordnance and Fortification	$2,585,000.00
Proving ground, Sandy Hook	1,690,978.09
Machine guns not used for seacoast defenses	385,073.09
Ordnance establishments, buildings, gun factory, powder factory, etc	3,376,952.00
Machinery for ordnance establishments	451,397.83
Experimental guns, carriages, and ammunition	653,041.03
Testing experimental guns and carriages, armor plates, etc	148,085.84
Implements, equipments, alteration, and maintenance of old armament	519,038.00
Field material and ammunition of old designs	6,331,819.75
Returned to Treasury	110,928.69
School submarine defense	16,500.00
Amount expended for temporary batteries (national defense fund)	302,817.90
Construction of post buildings, act June 6, 1896	100,000.00
Repair and maintenance Fort Monroe, Va., acts Mar. 2, 1895, and June 6, 1896	18,267.50

This statement does not include estimates of the cost of the additional seacoast defenses needed to complete the fortification projects in accordance with the plans of the National Coast Defense Board, for the reason that the department has now under consideration the subject of modifying the plans of that board so as to provide that the large-caliber guns to be emplaced in future as additions to existing defenses will be of 16-inch instead of 14-inch caliber as recommended by that board. In view of this fact, it is not deemed practicable to furnish estimates at this time as to the cost of completing the seacoast defenses.

In addition to the above for the continental United States, it is estimated that there will in the future be annually required $1,000,000 for maintenance, repair, and minor alterations, and $425,000 for target practice.

And, in addition, it is also estimated that $70,000 will be annually required for maintenance, repair, and minor alterations, plus a proportionate increase due to the installation of new armament as it is supplied for the insular possessions.

Under the second general classification, first noted, it is estimated that remaining items, coming under subdivision a will be as follows: For new matériel, including funds for the alteration of 3.2-inch batteries, $3,861,718.07; for reserve ammunition, $5,347,812; making a total of $9,209,530.07.

In addition to the above, it is estimated that there will be required annually $55,000 for alteration, maintenance, and repair, and $140,000 for target practice.

It should be stated in connection with the foregoing items for Field Artillery matériel and ammunition that it is also estimated by the War Department that for such remaining matériel and ammunition for the use of the militia there will be required a total of $22,411,239.43; for which latter sum, however, it is expected that estimates will be submitted and appropriations carried in the Army bill.

In the present estimates there is asked, under the first general division for continental United States, subdivision a, new matériel, etc., $1,746,324.42, of which sum there is recommended in the accompanying bill $1,673,000, under subdivision b, maintenance, repair, etc., $1,008,500, of which amount the bill carries $1,038,500; and under subdivision c, target-practice ammunition, $425,000, and $26,100 for submarine-mine practice, all of which is recommended in the bill, except $100, making a total estimate of $3,265,924.42, of which the bill carries $3,162,500.

In the insular possessions, under subdivision a, there is asked for new matériel, ammunition, etc., $763,678, of which there is recommended in the bill $753,678; and under subdivision b, maintenance, repair, etc., $99,000, of which the sum of $89,000 is recommended; making total estimates of $862,678, of which $842,678, as above stated, is recommended; making a grand total of estimates of $4,128,602.42 for both continental United States and the insular possessions under the first general division, of which there is recommended $4,005,178.

Under the second general classification there is asked, under subdivision a, new matériel, etc., including alteration of 3.2-inch batteries, $1,780,000, all of which is recommended, with an authorization of $300,000; under subdivision b, maintenance, repairs, etc., $55,000, of which $50,000 is given; under subdivision c, target-practice ammunition, $140,000, of which $135,000 is given; making total estimates of $1,975,000, of which the bill carries $1,965,000, with authorization of $300,000 as above.

Under the third general division there are asked the following items:

Current expenses, ordnance proving ground, Sandy Hook, N. J.	$56,200
Expenses of officers at the proving ground and compensation of draftsmen	18,700
Board of Ordnance and Fortification	15,000
Total	89,900

All of the estimates under the third general division, $89,900, is recommended, and in addition thereto an item of $138.90 for reimbursement of Col. Frank Green, retired.

The funds appropriated under the fortification acts are expended by or under the supervision of the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief Signal Officer, and the Chief of Engineers. In general terms the Chief of Ordnance has charge of those items pertaining to seacoast cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments; mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments; ammunition for seacoast cannon; ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon; ammunition, subcaliber guns, and other accessories for seacoast artillery practice; ammunition, subcaliber guns, and other accessories for mountain, field, and siege artillery practice; alteration and maintenance of seacoast artillery; alteration and maintenance of mobile artillery; current expenses of the ordnance proving ground, Sandy Hook, N. J., necessary expenses of officers at the proving ground, and compensation of draftsmen. In addition he has charge of the accounts, although not of the disbursements, pertaining to submarine mines, and the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and expends the funds allotted him by the Secretary of War for fire-control instruments.

The Chief Signal Officer has charge of the operation and maintenance of fire-control installation at seacoast defenses and the expenditure of such funds as may be allotted him by the Secretary of War for the procurement of wiring and instruments for communication service from the appropriations for fire control.

The Chief of Engineers has charge of the construction, maintenance, repair, and modernization of emplacements for seacoast armament; installation and replacement of electric light and power plants and searchlights at seacoast fortifications; procurement or reclamation of land for sites for fortifications; preparation of plans for fortifications; tools, electrical, and engine supplies for operating electric light and power plants in seacoast batteries, and reserve lights therefor; construction, maintenance, and repair of sea walls and embankments; construction, preservation, and repair of structures for torpedo defense; land defenses of seacoast fortifications, exclusive of electrical communications and armament; and the expenditure of such funds as may be allotted him by the Secretary of War from fire-control appropriations for construction of fire-control stations and accessories and purchase of lands and rights of way.

The estimate for fire-control stations and accessories, electrical communications, and range finders, and other instruments for fire control at the fortifications is submitted by the Chief of Coast Artillery, and the appropriation when made is carried on the books of the disbursing officer of the War Department, expenditures being made by the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief Signal Officer, and the Chief of Engineers in accordance with allotments made them by the Secretary of War for particular purposes. The estimate for submarine mines is prepared by the Chief of Coast Artillery and disbursed under his supervision; the accounts are kept by the Chief of Ordnance.

LIMITATIONS.

The following limitations not heretofore imposed on appropriations are recommended:

On page 2:

"The Secretary of War is authorized to grant to the Norfolk Southern Railroad Co., its successors and assigns, a perpetual right of way through the lands which have been or which may be acquired for fortification purposes at Cape Henry, Va., on such location as he may approve, in exchange for all of said company's lands and rights of way lying within the boundaries of the lands acquired or to be acquired for said fortification purposes: Provided, That the said railroad company may be reimbursed from appropriations which may be applicable to the construction of defenses at Cape Henry, Va., for the expense which may be imposed upon the said railroad company in changing the location of its tracks, stations, or other buildings and appurtenances from their present location on the said lands and rights of way of the said railroad company to the right of way hereinbefore authorized to be granted to the said company by the Secretary of War."

On page 4:

"The accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to pay to Lieut. Col. Frank Greene, Signal Corps, United States Army, retired, the sum of $138.90."

On page 7, with reference to officers on duty at the Sandy Hook Proving Ground:

"That hereafter the occupancy by such officers, providing themselves with quarters elsewhere, of one room in the building at the proving ground locally known as the brick house shall not be construed as occupancy of public quarters within the meaning of this act and of the law authorizing allowance and commutation of quarters: Provided further, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are directed to reimburse Lieut. Col. Jay E. Hoffer, Ordnance Department, United States Army, the sum of $118, and First Lieut. Alfred H. Hobley, Ordnance Department, United States Army, the sum of $156, refunded by them to the United States on April 22 and May 21, 1914, respectively, on account of moneys received by them as commutation of quarters during part of the period June 1 to October 31, 1913, from the appropriation from which payment was originally made and to which the funds were credited when refunded."

On page 10:

"The transfer of four 12-inch mortars and their carriages and accessories, having an approximate value of $110,000, from fortifications in the United States to the insular possessions, is approved."

On page 12:

"That the payment of rent for offices heretofore leased in the District of Columbia for the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and the payments heretofore made for rent of such offices, are hereby authorized."

On page 13:

"SEC. 5. That the several appropriations herein made and heretofore made in fortification appropriation acts shall be available for the payment of a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence to civilian employees when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914."

The Clerk read as follows:

The transfer of four 12-inch mortars and their carriages and accessories, having an approximate value of $110,000, from fortifications in the United States to the insular possessions, is approved.

Mr. MILLER. Is this the item the gentleman referred to in relation to mortars for the Philippines?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the item is on top of page 10, where $110,000 is appropriated to manufacture these mortars.

Mr. MILLER. Those are for Hawaii?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; those are for the Philippines.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman refers to the paragraph at the top of the page?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and I will tell the gentleman how it came about. The paragraph says:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defenses, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $110,000.

That includes mortars.

Mr. MILLER. It might.

Mr. SHERLEY. The language is sufficient to embrace mortars. Here is what happened: They found that they had an additional balance that they could use for emplacements, and they have begun and are completing the emplacements, and because they did not need to come in and ask for an appropriation for emplacement the need for an estimate for the ordnance was overlooked until, in checking up the matter, it was found that it was necessary to get $110,000 to build the four mortars, and that is the reason I am so sure that I am correct, and I verified the matter this morning.

I assure the gentleman they are going to manufacture these four mortars that are to go out there, and that the item that has just been read with reference to a transfer is simply an authorization of a transfer already made of mortars in regard to the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the gentleman is absolutely correct. If he has looked it up, I know he is. I certainly have that much confidence in the distinguished gentleman, but I do recall distinctly that one of the witnesses in the hearings testified that the four mortars that were at former fortifications here were to be transported over to the islands.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be so. There may have been some confusion. The fact that there were four mortars for Hawaii and four for the Philippines, and that both were for land defenses, would naturally lend itself to confusion.

Mr. MILLER. In that case, if they are manufacturing four new mortars, I am quite sure that they will have an increased range over the four old ones contemplated in this paragraph. I want to ask another question. Has there been any firing of mortars at a distance of 19,000 yards that may be called efficient?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, there are quite a number of our new mortars that have that range.

Mr. MILLER. That is very much in advance of the maximum range that I have been informed by artillery men mortars usually have.

Mr. SHERLEY. We are building a mortar now that is so much longer than the previous mortars that it looks very much like a gun, and those mortars do have a range such as I have indicated, and their effectiveness in the use of either shrapnel or high-explosive shell in the way of covering a terrain against a land attack would be very, very great.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question. I think the gentleman very clearly and vigorously stated the situation this morning on one important matter, when he said that we should always consider whether or not the enemy had command of the sea when we are considering a fortification. That is basic, of course, and absolutely essential to any consideration. Are not the fortifications of the Philippine Islands based on the fact that we will not have command of the sea and that the enemy will, and is not that an exact reversal of the situation that exists respecting our fortifications generally?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not entirely so. If we had command of the sea it would be impossible for continental United States to be invaded, unless Canada or Mexico should go to war with us, so that the sea control is one of the primal matters in either instance. I think what the gentleman has in mind is this, that a situation might arise in the Philippines, in case of sudden war, where no decisive naval engagement was had and where our fleet was not so immediately available as to protect those islands, and that——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that it ought to be possible to make a stand there pending relief and succor from our fleet and from the United States, and in that particular I thoroughly agree with the gentleman as to the importance of having unusually strong fortifications there.

Mr. MILLER. That is the only reason that I have advocated it, and that advocacy is based on recommendations of military men that we have some fortification to protect against the landing of troops and the siege of our island forts by such landed troops operating from the land against both wings of the fortifications.

Mr. SHERLEY. Wherein I think the gentleman is mistaken is this: It was at one time sought to put batteries on those shores, but they would have been subject to a land assault, and it was so much better to have them on the islands that they discarded that idea and fortified Caballo, Carabao, and El Fraile, in addition to making of Corregidor a great fortification that would be the last stand in case everything went against us. As I stated a few moments ago, it is not to be supposed that there will be no aid from mobile troops or that there will not be any use for mobile artillery; but it is not believed advisable to put permanent fortifications on those two sites, and if they were put there, then it could be said that they are subject also to attack on the flank.

Mr. MILLER. But their presence would locate the enemy, and that is the point.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken in another thing. The gentleman is reaching some conclusions in regard to a war game that was played there. I think war games have great value in that they enable men in a measure to anticipate what might arise in case of actual war.

But they are not of such value as to warrant men in drawing fixed conclusions always as to what would actually happen from a theoretical happening. For instance, in one of the war games which was played over in the Philippines they put out of commission and had captured by assault batteries which were on the top of a cliff which was almost perpendicular for 250 feet, and it was so absurd that afterwards there was a correction made and a statement that the decision of the war umpires was altogether out of reason, because you can not even get a barrel of cement up there without hoisting it up by derrick.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman permit one question, and I will not go into detail——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for the additional three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. In order that the element of theory might not exist in this case, they fired the actual shots, not one shot, but many.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, there is some of that country where unquestionably guns could be brought up, but it is not an easy proposition, and after they got there it would not be a very healthy place to stay. I do not think the gentleman's conclusions that these fortifications could be readily put out of business would be substantiated by the judgment of a great majority of the men who have studied the matter.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from Kentucky spoke about these new mortars. Does the gentleman refer to the mortars in the report signed by Assistant Secretary Breckenridge and others? It appears on page 29 of the hearings, at the top of the page. The range of the mortars recommended is 21,000 yards.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I took my size of mortars from the table, found on 206, because I always like to be conservative, where the 12-inch mortars, latest models, have a range of 19,319 yards. Now, I am not prepared to say that these new mortars might not have a range of 21,000 yards. It only makes my case that much stronger.

Mr. GARDNER. What I was getting at is this: Of these motars with a range of 19,319 yards are there any outside of the Canal Zone?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there are, but I would have to refer to the record. If the gentleman will wait a minute, I can tell him, I think.

Mr. GARDNER. In place?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, we have some few mortars over in the Philippines.

Mr. GARDNER. Installed?

Mr. SHERLEY. And I am not sure about the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. GARDNER. There are some provided?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; there are a number of mortars emplaced in the Philippines and have been for quite a while.

Mr. GARDNER. Are those the long-range mortars?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think so.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION.

For all needful and proper purchases, experiments, and tests to ascertain, with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, small arms, cartridges, projectiles, fuses, explosives, torpedoes, armor plates, and other implements and engines of war, and to purchase or cause to be manufactured, under authority of the Secretary of War, such guns, carriages, armor plates, and other war material as may, in the judgment of the board, be necessary in the proper discharge of the duty devolved upon it by the act approved September 22, 1888; salary of the civilian member of the board and for his necessary traveling expenses when traveling on duty as provided by the act of February 24, 1891; necessary expenses of the board, including rent of offices in the District of Columbia at not exceeding $900 per annum and a per diem allowance to each officer detailed to serve thereon, when employed on duty away from his permanent station, of $2.50 a day; test of experimental guns, carriages, and other devices procured in accordance with the recommendation of the board, $15,000, the expenditure of which shall be made by the several bureaus of the War Department heretofore having jurisdiction of the same, or by the board itself, as the Secretary of War may direct: Provided, That before any money shall be expended in the construction or test of any gun, gun carriage, ammunition, or implements under the supervision of the said board, the board shall be satisfied, after due inquiry, that the Government of the United States has a lawful right to use the inventions involved in the construction of such gun, gun carriage, ammunition, or implements, or that the construction or test is made at the request of a person either having such lawful right or authorized to convey the same to the Government: Provided further, That the payment of rent for offices heretofore leased in the District of Columbia for the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and the payments heretofore made for rent of such offices, are hereby authorized.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to get the statement in the RECORD that the amount of ammunition for the seacoast cannon of continental United States on hand and under manufacture, which has hitherto been provided, is only 66 per cent of the total amount estimated by the Taft Board as the necessary minimum for our continental seacoast armament when complete. However, this ammunition amounts to 73 per cent of the quantity estimated as necessary for that part of our continental seacoast armament which has hitherto been provided. I shall read a passage from the evidence of Gen. Crozier. I do so because there has been some confusion as to whether the 73 per cent of which we have been speaking means 73 per cent of the ammunition estimated as requisite for the entire armament of seacoast cannon after the whole project is complete or 73 per cent of the amount estimated as necessary for that part of the armament which up to the present time has been authorized. On page 192 of the hearings Gen. Crozier said:

The total value of the full allowance of ammunition for the cannon which have already been provided for continental United States is $16,487,000, and the total amount in value which we have on hand is $12,099,000. I think that figures out about 73 per cent.

In order to clear this question up in my own mind, on February 12 I wrote a letter to the Secretary of War. He replied as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 16, 1915.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GARDNER: Referring to your letter of February 12, 1915, in which you request certain information pertaining to the value of ammunition for seacoast cannon, it is assumed from your reference therein to your letter of January 25, 1915, that your queries relate to the armament of continental United States, and the following data are based upon this understanding:

1. The value of the ammunition on hand and under manufacture is $12,099,000.

2. On the basis of the ammunition allowance recommended by the Coast Defense Board, the value of the full allowance of ammunition for armament provided and contemplated is $18,216,000.

3. For the armament provided to date, the value of the additional ammunition necessary to bring the supply up to the full allowance recommended by the Coast Defense Board is $4,388,000.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

This letter shows that we have on hand or under manufacture 66 per cent of the ammunition for the whole continental coast defense project, or 73 per cent of that part of the project for which money has hitherto been appropriated. It is understood, of course, that this statement refers to the requirements estimated by the Taft Board, or, more properly speaking, the National Coast Defense Board.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman that I have never questioned that, and I have never made any statement questioning that.

Mr. GARDNER. But if the gentleman will read his statement this morning he will find that the matter, or so it seems to me, was left in some doubt. Furthermore, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER] yesterday evening made an observation which did not seem to me entirely to clear the matter up. I simply desire to make everything plain in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERLEY. There was not any confusion in my mind. I knew the 73 per cent was of guns not mounted.

Mr. GARDNER. I think if the gentleman will read over his notes this morning he will find it as I have said.

Mr. SHERLEY. I said I had no doubt as to the matter, and I agree with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GARDNER. That is that the ammunition in question is 73 per cent of the amount required for the armanent hitherto authorized?

Mr. SHERLEY. And not 73 per cent of all that is expected to be put in the authorization. The only question I have with the gentleman touching ammunition is the statement he made in regard to guns, and I called attention, by reading testimony as to the situation as to some of the guns which showed that in some cases that were over 100 per cent, whereas others were down lower, and with the mortars, all averaged about 73 per cent.

Now, the reason the gentleman is able to make his statement in regard to two hours' supply on a transfer from the Pacific to the Atlantic is due to the fact that there are a great many more guns on the Atlantic than on the Pacific. Manifestly, when you send your Pacific supply over to the Atlantic you do not increase the Atlantic supply 100 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. It is true, as the gentleman says, that of certain kinds of ammunition we have over 100 per cent of the Taft Board requirement, provided that it is our Pacific coast which is attacked and provided we are successful in shipping to that coast all the ammunition accumulated for the supply of the guns in our Atlantic coast fortifications. But suppose that it is our Atlantic coast which is attacked and suppose that we entirely strip the Pacific defenses of every ounce of seacoast ammunition and transfer it to the threatened Atlantic defenses, how shall we stand as regards a sufficiency of ammunition on the Taft Board basis? On that basis it is supposed that we should have as a minimum amount two hours' battle supply for each gun after this transferring business is complete. But would that be so? By no means. Let me read you Gen. Weaver's statement about the various sizes of ammunition. It is to be found on page 198 of the hearings:

> If they were shipped from one coast to the other the percentage for a two hours' supply would be as follows: For 3-inch guns, 42 per cent; for 4.7 inch guns, 74 per cent; for 5-inch guns, 96 per cent; for 6-inch guns, 42 per cent; for 8-inch guns, 55 per cent; for 10-inch guns, 70 per cent; for 12-inch guns, 71 per cent; and for 12-inch mortars, 34 per cent.

In other words, we should be, to an alarming extent, short of the minimum ammunition supply recommended by the so-called Taft board if the war should develop in such a way as to bring the attack on the Atlantic side.

When Gen. Weaver made that statement, Mr. SHERLEY said:

> That would depend upon what coast they were shipped from?
> Gen. WEAVER. Yes.
> Mr. SHERLEY. That is, if shipped from the Pacific to the Atlantic?
> Gen. WEAVER. Shipped from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast.

I admit at once that if you take all the ammunition from the Atlantic coast and ship it to the Pacific coast, then you have a good deal more than 100 per cent ammunition supply for a great many of the guns on the Pacific coast; that is, on the Taft board estimate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SHERLEY. I just want to take a minute to say this: On the Atlantic there are a great many fortifications that, under no conceivable conditions, to my mind, would ever be involved, and, therefore, in figuring the percentages for those guns you are figuring with an abundance of caution, and if you eliminated those guns from consideration your percentage as to other guns would amount to considerable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what the plan is as to the reserve ammunition of these respective guns in various fortifications?

Mr. SHERLEY. I went so fully into that this morning——

Mr. STAFFORD. I listened to the gentleman an hour and a half, and then I was called out of the Chamber. If that was the case, I will read the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there was a very considerable addition that could be made to the supply of coast-artillery ammunition by discontinuing certain useless fortifications?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman understood me to say practically that. I know what the gentleman is going to do. He is going to read a statement in which a remark is made as to what the percentage would amount to.

Mr. GARDNER. I am going to read a statement from Gen. Weaver that totally disagrees with you.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand. I want to say in response to that, and after that I shall not undertake to further review this matter, that there is no agreement as to what fortifications are needed to-day. Now, what the general had in mind was simply guns that he thought could be taken down and the fortification not kept, but what I have in mind are the many fortifications that would be in no case involved.

That makes a different premise and therefore a different conclusion.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, I think the general's opinion needed no particular elucidation. Here is what he says, on page 68 of the hearings:

> Gen. WEAVER. The number of guns that may be abandoned is so small a percentage of the total number mounted that the abandonment of such armament will result in but slight increases in the amounts of ammunition available for the remaining armament.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes. The gentleman is talking about abandonment and I am talking about something else.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from Kentucky tried his best to get Gen. Weaver to say the opposite. I read:

> Mr. SHERLEY. Now, in point of fact, there are a great many guns that are mounted in continental United States that under practically no conceivable condition would ever be needed?
> Gen. WEAVER. There are a number.
> Mr. SHERLEY. But there are quite a number?
> Gen. WEAVER. Yes; quite a number; but the number is not large in comparison with the total number of guns mounted.
> Mr. SHERLEY. So that when you have gotten a one hour's allowance for all of the guns in the United States you actually have a considerably greater allowance for all of the guns than will ever be needed?

Then Gen. Weaver answered in the way I just read. How he could possibly have misunderstood what the gentleman from Kentucky was talking about I can not understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. I said that the premise upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts is now proceeding was not the premise of the General.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. While I understand the bill does not so expressly specify, I gathered from the remarks of the gentleman in general debate and in reading the hearings that it is not intended to manufacture any Gathmann or torpedo shells to be used in ranges of 10,000 yards and under.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know of no proposal to manufacture Gathmann shells.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, torpedo shells.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not quibbling with the gentleman. I do not think they propose to manufacture the type of shell that the gentleman speaks of as the Gathmann shell, or the type that is spoken of as the Isham shell.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not ask the question because I disagreed with the gentleman on that point, because, on the contrary, I entirely agree with him.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that they are not going to manufacture any of them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say at this time that I thought it was a great mistake to even authorize those in another bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. He says there are a great many guns that will probably never be used. I presume he referred to fortifications like Forth Wadsworth and Fort Hamilton, the second line of defense after Sandy Hook. If Sandy Hook were taken, we might have to rely on Fort Wadsworth and Fort Hamilton.

Mr. SHERLEY. I had not in mind those cases, but cases that are more pronounced. We have a lot of fortifications down here on the Potomac River, for example, where there is not a modern warship that could get near them, and nobody except a person fit for an asylum would ever undertake to bring anything of any size up there to attack those fortifications. What is true there is also true of a number of other fortifications, so far as their importance is concerned.

I am not going to quarrel with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] as to whether my statement is technically to the letter accurate. I still think that it remains true that in a practical sense there are a number of fortifications for which percentages have been figured that do not need to be figured. That does not interfere with the fact that we need to more nearly approach the totals to have a desirable amount of ammunition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if necessary, I move to strike out any number of words. [Laughter.] I would like to ask about the last proviso about rent. What is the occasion for this? Has there been some ruling about that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. They have rented quarters here, not to any great extent, but they have certain rooms where they keep some of their maps, in a fireproof building, and where there is vault protection, and the comptroller ruled that there was no authority for the payment of rent in the District of Columbia because it was not expressly stated. As a result, it is necessary not only to carry a provision for the future payment of rent, but also to cure any question as to past payments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the several appropriations herein made and heretofore made in fortification appropriation acts shall be available for the payment of a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence to civilian employees when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section at the bottom of the page.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, at the end of section 5, add as a new section the following: "All unexpended balances, amounting to $13,531.50, of the appropriations heretofore at various times made for the development and manufacture of the so-called Emery disappearing gun carriage are hereby covered back into the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the history of the Emery disappearing gun carriage has been an exceedingly strange one. The first appropriation for this Emery gun carriage was made in the year 1893, and additional appropriations have been made from time to time since that date. In other words, for a period of some 22 years the United States has been making appropriations of larger or smaller sums for the Emery carriage.

A. H. Emery, the would-be inventor of this disappearing gun carriage—or nonappearing gun carriage, as they call it in the War Department—achieved a considerable reputation perhaps 25 years ago by making a very elaborate testing machine for the Watertown Arsenal. That met with great success and won the inventor a wide renown. Since that time several additional machines of his invention have been installed and put to good use out at the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. Emery was fortunate in possessing the confidence and the ear of conspicuous Members of Congress both on the other side of the Capitol and on this side, and as a result he was enabled, in 1893, as I have said, to get his original appropriation for this purpose, amounting to $130,000. Then, in 1896 he got $10,000 more; in 1900, $40,000 more; in 1903, $40,000 more; and in 1908, $30,000 more; so that in the quarter century which has elapsed since this project was first brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States he has received in appropriations an even quarter of a million dollars.

The various enactments have in the main relieved him from the necessity of giving any quid pro quo, and from the first day when this authorization was made down to the present day the War Department has not received a single cent's worth of equivalent in return. We have been pouring out this money as the days and years have passed, and we have been getting nothing whatever to show for it. Out of that original quarter of a million dollars there is to-day remaining in the Treasury of the United States $13,531.50. There seems to be no real possibility that anything can ever be done by Mr. Emery toward the ultimate completion and delivery of the gun carriage. I am told by officials of the War Department and officials of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications that even if Mr. Emery should be successful in building this gun carriage along the lines of the present endeavor, it would not be of the slightest value for our coast defenses; that designs have come on since 1893, have been installed in the coast defenses, and have in turn become obsolete and been superseded by more advanced and more efficacious inventions. So that if the miraculous should happen, if Mr. Emery should succeed after the lapse of all these years in completing a practical carriage, it would not be of the slightest value to the United States Government.

The original appropriation and every appropriation since have been made in direct disregard and in direct violation of the recommendations of the War Department and of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. I have in my hand a reference to various reports which prove that my statement is true, but I will not take the time to refer to them now. I will just refer to one or two of the very recent ones. For example, in the letter of transmission of the report of the board by the former Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, in 1912, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, under date of February 3, 1912, the following appears:

Attention is invited to the statement of the board regarding the Emery disappearing carriage, * * * and in this connection Maj. Gen. Wood, president of the board, in submitting the report, remarks as follows: "The possibility of any useful result being obtained from Mr. Emery's 20 years' experimentation does not warrant continuation of his contract and possibly payment to him of a further $13,500." The matter is therefore submitted to Congress, with a view to action looking to the cancellation of the outstanding contract and the saving to the Government of at least a portion of the money heretofore appropriated for this purpose.

In the report of the board for 1913 the following appears:

Nothing has occurred in the last year that would indicate the eventual completion and delivery of this carriage * * *. Of the quarter million dollars appropriated there remains unexpended $13,531.51, but as some affirmative action on Mr. Emery's part is required to enable him to draw this money from the Treasury, it is likely to remain undisturbed unless Congress authorizes cancellation of the contract and allows the money to revert to the general funds of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize the fact that the United States has never had the slightest benefit of any kind, real or theoretical, from Mr. Emery's scheme, and that there seems to be no possible reason why this sum, even though small, should not be saved to the Federal Government.

In this connection I wanted to call the attention of the committee to what has resulted from the repeated appropriation by Congress, in direct violation of the recommendation of experts to whom we pay large salaries and who have claimed throughout that the plan was not feasible. Congress took the bit in its teeth, ignored the recommendation of experts, with the result I have indicated. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this recommendation and this amendment may be adopted. I believe that Congress ought to save what little it can out of the wreck of this quarter of a million dollars.

EMERY DISAPPEARING GUN CARRIAGE.

The following appropriations have been made for the Emery disappearing gun carriage:

Act approved Feb. 18, 1893 (Public, 69)	$130,000.00
Act approved June 6, 1896	10,000.00
Act approved May 25, 1900	40,000.00
Act approved Mar. 3, 1903	40,000.00
Act approved May 27, 1908	30,000.00
Total appropriations		$250,000.00
Of this amount there was paid Mr. Emery prior to 1903	135,656.98
Of this amount there was paid Mr. Emery subsequent to 1903	100,811.51
Total paid to Mr. Emery to date		236,468.49
Unexpended balance of appropriations		13,531.51

The act of February 18, 1893, above referred to, provides in part as follows:

To enable the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications to procure and test one 12-inch elevating carriage of A. H. Emery's design, $130,000, * * * and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to contract, without advertising, with A. H. Emery for this carriage, and test it, the same to be built, erected, and tested for a sum not exceeding $130,000, which price shall cover the cost of the carriage erected, and including all the powder and projectiles necessary for its preliminary test * * *. Of the price of this contract $110,000 shall be for the carriage and foundations erected, including all changes and repairs, and $20,000 shall be paid the contractor for the preliminary testing of the carriage * * *. Of the $110,000 to be paid for the carriage and its foundations 60 per cent shall be paid in partial payments as the work progresses * * *. Before advancing any part of this 60 per cent the contractor shall furnish bonds satisfactory to the Secretary of War for the return of this money if the carriage is not accepted.

The other portions of this act seem not sufficiently material in this connection to require their quotation.

On March 17, 1893, in accordance with the terms of the act, a contract was entered into with Mr. Emery for the delivery of the completed carriage at Sandy Hook within two years after the date of the contract. The act of June 6, 1896, amended the act of February 18, 1893, by providing that 85 per cent (instead of 60 per cent) of the $110,000 to be paid for the carriage and foundations should be paid in partial payments as the work progressed. It also expressly stipulated, in direct reversal of the earlier act, that "no bond shall be required for the return of this money if the carriage is not accepted, nor shall the said Emery be required to return the money paid * * *." It also provided for an additional $10,000 for a loading apparatus to accompany the carriage.

The Board of Ordnance and Fortification strongly disapproved of the foregoing amendments, stating in a report dated October 31, 1896:

The plans for this carriage were not completely worked out at the time the appropriation bill was passed—referring to 1893 bill—and were never approved by the board. In its action of January 25, 1893, the board stated as follows:

"In view of the doubts in the mind of the board as to the successful working of this carriage, as expressed in its action of December 29, 1892, it is of the opinion that if Congress deem it advisable to authorize and direct the construction, the appropriation should be so worded as to make the cost of the carriage and foundations payable only after their successful test and acceptance by the War Department."

The board still adheres to the opinion thus expressed. Should the proposed amendment become a law, $93,500 might be paid to Mr. Emery for preliminary work on a carriage the plans for which have never been approved by experts on this class of work and the patents for which are not transferred to the United States, although it should prove of no value after completion.

It will be observed that in spite of this opinion Congress persisted in passing the objectionable amendments above quoted.

In accordance with the amendatory act, a supplementary contract was entered into with Mr. Emery to deliver the loading apparatus at the Sandy Hook Proving Ground March 17, 1898.

On July 27, 1896, the date of the delivery of the carriage was extended to March 17, 1898. Further extensions were granted, first to March 17, 1899, and then to March 28, 1900. Other extensions have since been requested from time to time. A report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification dated October 31, 1899, states:

The original act was passed after this board, having carefully considered the drawings and specifications submitted to it by Mr. Emery, had declined to approve its plan of construction. The amount appropriated by Congress for the same is several times as large as the cost of carriages of the same kind now in service. A large portion of that amount has already been expended in the construction of innumerable pieces of the carriage. Although the inventor and contractor gives no information whereupon any conjecture or speculation can be made as to the time when the carriage may be completed, yet he has drawn from the Treasury $95,380.16, of which he has expended $12,500 for the purchase of ammunition with which to test it after completion. It now hardly seems probable that this experimental carriage will be finished in time to be used, even if successful, in the adopted plan of our coast defenses.

In volume 3 of the Report of the War Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900, being a report of the Chief of Ordnance, at pages 349 to 359 appears the report of hearings held April 14, 16, and 18, 1900, before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations which was considering the fortifications appropriation bill. Gen. Buffington, the principal witness, deals at length with the Emery gun carriage, stating again and again that the character of it does not commend itself.

It requires a pit of about 30 feet, which is filled up with springs and with hydraulic cylinders, the practicability of the working of which does not appear very clearly. We do not in the ordnance office approve of this carriage as a general type for mounting our seacoast guns, on account of this complication and the expense it would take to build the emplacements for them, and I could not recommend any further appropriation to be expended on it.

Gen. Buffington says that the contract had already been extended five times since 1893, and that there was an application from Mr. Emery then on file for a further extension; that the United States had received nothing in return for its money expended, then amounting to nearly $100,000; that the War Department did not know the stage of completion of the carriage nor when it would be completed; that it was purely experimental, and that experience would indicate that, even if originally workable, it would soon get out of order and become unserviceable.

There is considerable evidence that Senator Teller, who was then on the subcommittee, was greatly interested in behalf of Mr. Emery; certainly the character of his questioning of Gen. Buffington would so indicate. Gen. Buffington pointed out that as he was the deviser of a carriage then used in the service he was placed in a somewhat questionable position in criticizing the Emery carriage.

In spite of the recommendation of Gen. Buffington, there was carried in the act approved May 25, 1900, a further appropriation of $40,000, and by the act approved March 3, 1903, the further sum of $40,000 was appropriated to enable Mr. Emery "to complete and erect the 12-inch carriage." The fortifications appropriation act approved April 21, 1904, authorized the Secretary of War, "to enable A. H. Emery to proceed promptly in the work of building and erecting the 12-inch disappearing carriage and its loading apparatus," to advance Emery any part of the unexpended balance, then amounting to $84,343.02, and also to make a new contract, relieving Emery from further work in connection with the 12-inch carriage and substituting therefor a contract for an 8 or 10 inch disappearing carriage.

In accordance with the provisions of this act, all work on the 12-inch carriage was suspended, and on June 13, 1904, a contract was entered into by the Chief of Ordnance with Mr. Emery for one 10-inch disappearing carriage of his design. The sundry civil appropriation act approved May 27, 1908, carried a further appropriation of $30,000 to enable Emery to complete the gun carriage, "$20,000 to be paid on the approval of this act, $5,000 when Emery is ready to put in the foundations for this carriage, and the other $5,000 when he is ready to erect the carriage for its preliminary test." The report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification for the year 1908 states, page 11:

The board was not consulted regarding, nor has it any knowledge of the purpose of this additional appropriation other than as shown by the act.

The report of the same board for the year 1910 states:

In the latter part of 1908 Mr. Emery constructed a railroad track connecting the site selected for his carriage at Fort Hancock with the Sandy Hook Proving Ground Railroad. This track was used for the transportation of material for the construction of the concrete foundations for the carriage. Under the provisions of the act of May 27, 1908, Mr. Emery was paid $5,000 for the completion of this work, since which time no further deliveries have been made.

Of the $114,343.02 available for the execution of the present contract with Mr. Emery for his carriage $100,811.51 has been paid him.

There may be added to the $114,000 mentioned above the sum of $135,656.98 paid under a former contract which was canceled by congressional authority, so that the total amount authorized has been a quarter of a million dollars. Of this sum there remains to be paid Mr. Emery $13,531.51. Another year has passed, the seventeenth since this work was authorized, and the Government has nothing to show for the expenditure except the foundations for the carriage, completed about two years ago.

The report of the next year—1911—pages 5 and 6, states:

There have been no development, so far as the board is informed, in connection with the Emery gun carriage, and the board can only repeat what has been said heretofore in regard to the history of this carriage. All the work on the Emery design has been done under direct legislative enactment, and the only part to be taken by the board in the matter is that when completed, if ever, the carriage is to be tested under its supervision. * * * The Government still has nothing to show for the expenditure of 95 per cent of the appropriations except the foundations for the carriage which were put in three years ago in order to enable Mr. Emery to obtain an additional $5,000 as provided by the act of 1908, practically the first which required him to do anything in return for money paid him.

The report for 1912, page 6, says:

The second decade is drawing to a close since Mr. Emery first undertook the work of developing a suitable gun carriage. In this 20 years other designs have been developed, served their time in the coast defenses, and been superseded by more perfect appliances, while Mr. Emery's work is still uncompleted.

In the letter of transmission of this report from the Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives under date of December 3, 1912, appears the following:

Attention is invited to the statement of the board regarding the Emery disappearing carriage, * * * and in this connection Maj. Gen. Wood, president of the board, in submitting the report, remarks as follows: "The possibility of any useful result being obtained from Mr. Emery's 20 years' experimentation does not warrant continuation of his contract and possible payment to him of a further $13,500." The matter is therefore submitted to Congress with a view to action looking to the cancellation of the outstanding contract and the saving to the Government of at least a portion of the money heretofore appropriated for this purpose.

The report of the board for 1913, page 5, states:

Nothing has occurred in the last year that would indicate the eventual completion and delivery of this carriage. * * * Of the quarter million dollars appropriated there remain unexpended $13,531.51, but as some affirmative action on Mr. Emery's part is required to enable him to draw this money from the Treasury, it is likely to remain undisturbed unless Congress authorizes cancellation of the contract and allows the money to revert to the general funds of the Government.

In the endeavor to learn for myself something of the human side of this long story I was referred by various officials of the War Department to Grahame H. Powell, secretary to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. He states that Mr. Emery made a great reputation about 25 years ago with a wonderful testing machine which he made for the Watertown Arsenal; later he made a duplicate for the Bureau of Standards. He was very friendly, indeed, with certain Members of Congress. Through this friendship he was able to get the various appropriations through Congress against the approval and advice of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. Mr. Emery is still living, and just prior to my call had visited Mr. Powell. He now seeks an appropriation of $20,000, in addition to the unexpended balance.

Mr. Powell states that originally the alleged invention of Mr. Emery would have been highly useful and desirable for Army use, but that since 1893 many new devices have become perfected and are perfectly adequate for their purpose. Hence, even if Mr. Emery should now miraculously succeed in his endeavor, the result would be obsolete in type and of no especial value to the Army. The machines constructed for the purpose nowadays cost about $20,000. Mr. Emery's, as above shown, has cost nearly $250,000.

In view of this state of affairs, there seems every reason for the passage of an act covering back into the general fund of the Treasury the pittance which is still unexpended of the various appropriations made in behalf of Mr. Emery.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts called my attention to this proposed amendment. I did know of the history of the Emery gun carriage, and I quite agree with the gentleman's position. It is a splendid illustration of how Congress can lose its head and spend money unwisely. I did not know that there was any balance of the sums appropriated that had not been expended. Personally I see no reason why the amount should not be covered into the Treasury. It is a matter that I had not thought about until presented by the gentleman to me a while ago. This committee is in possession of as much information about it as I am. I assume that the gentleman from Massachusetts knows about the balances and knows whether they are obligated in any way. If they are, the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. They are not obligated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I see no reason why the amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the provision in the way of appropriations made during a series of years for the Emery gun carriage were lobbied through Congress. I do not use the term in an offensive way at all. The War Department never was in favor of the proposition, but Congress decided to spend one-quarter of a million dollars to see whether a man had a device which, if it proved successful, he would have been willing to have sold to us or let us use it at a high royalty. We spent the money, and if it had proved successful he would have had the advantage. It has not proved successful, and for a series of years the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications—if that is the correct title—has annually recommended that this money be covered back into the Treasury and the contract canceled. I do not know whether it would be safe for Congress to cancel the contract. Nothing is being done about it, although I was told some time ago that Mr. Emery was again coming before Congress to ask for another appropriation, hoping that he might develop some new idea in connection with the plan, the old ones having all failed.

It seems to me it is quite advisable to end this thing by covering the money back into the Treasury. It ought to have taken an hour of discussion in the House to do it, in order to fasten in the minds of Members of the House the undesirability of going off halfcocked merely because some man pleads for a chance to make a pipe dream come true at the expense of the Government and for the benefit of the man, but to think coolly before we do it. That is not the only pipe-dream scheme that is floating around here now, somewhat similar in character.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the past history of the Emery gun carriage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rose a moment ago on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts not for the purpose of saying what I did say, although I think it was proper, but for the purpose of commending the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] for taking these reports of the board, examining them, examining this whole subject matter in the War Department, and then bringing a concrete proposition before the House. Such work as that deserves the thanks of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, report the bill with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21491, the fortifications appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with certain instructions, which I send to the desk, and on that motion I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to recommit the bill with instructions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARDNER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report an appropriation of $1,000,000 for purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon, in lieu of $200,000.

The SPEAKER. On that motion the gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 38, nays 219, answered "present" 2, not voting 164, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, because I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded present.

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 9509, granting a pension to Daniel Kelaher, Sixty-third Congress, first session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Also, the papers in the case of H. R. 3287, granting a pension to Mary Dowling, Sixty-third Congress, first session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by Gov. Spry, of Utah, before the conference of western governors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by Gov. Spry, of Utah. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE BILL 3863.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to file an additional report (No. 818, pt. 2) from the Committee on Public Lands on Senate bill 3863.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are several items which I think there ought to be a chance to consider in the House, or at least to have them voted upon separately, and manifestly it can not be done to-night. There are three in reference to mileage; one in reference to the legislative reference bureau—I do not know that is so important; one in reference to the expense of opening the Panama Canal; one for an emergency clerical service in the Department of State, about which as yet we have no information; one in reference to gauging liquors in the Internal-Revenue Department, which amendments some Members want to have a chance to consider.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman if that is the increase of $292,000 for appointments in the Internal-Revenue Department——

Mr. MANN. No; it is the one in reference to the opium law.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the one.

Mr. MANN. Where they provide for an appropriation of two or three hundred thousand dollars——

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the one.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Regardless of the civil-service law.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the one I wanted to know whether the gentleman was inquiring about.

Mr. MANN. One is an amendment that increases by several hundred thousand dollars the cost of collecting the internal revenue and the other amendment is the decrease of several hundred thousand dollars of the cost of gauging spirits with a provision in reference to the rectifying of spirits, concerning which I think no one in the House knows anything about.

Mr. BARTLETT. The reason I asked about that one in reference to enforcing the antinarcotic law——

Mr. MANN. The Harrison law.

Mr. BARTLETT (continuing). The Harrison law—is that we had some hearings before the subcommittee on the deficiency bill and we were informed to-day that has been incorporated in the legislative bill. That is the reason I asked about it, because we had some investigation and hearings and we had some information. I do not know whether the Senate had or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that the conferees will not be disposed to settle any of those large items without giving the House an opportunity to discuss them and vote on them. If we bring in any report it will be a report where the Senate has yielded or a partial report that will leave those questions open for the House to determine.

Mr. MANN. That item that the gentleman from Georgia refers to which is Senate amendment No. 65, apparently makes no provision for anything except for the next fiscal year. It says:

Being for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, $292,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Senate amendment was a deficiency appropriation. They applied to us for it, and we had some hearings upon it, but they ceased after they got it on the bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no deficiency in this item.

Mr. COX. May I ask if the Panama Canal item is the one for $160,000?

Mr. MANN. It is.

Mr. COX. That is the item that authorizes it to be turned over to the President?

Mr. MANN. It is.

Mr. COX. You asked in regard to 1, 2, and 18?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Of course, they all go together.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say he would not yield on it until the House had a chance to vote on it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. All of these important amendments will be brought back to the House for the House to consider and vote on unless the Senate yields.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the amendment the gentleman refers to—amendment No. 20—providing for a reference bureau. There are many Members of the House who would prefer to have that stand rather than to have it go out. The matter in controversy is whether it should be retained in the bill rather than eliminated.

Mr. MANN. We desire a separate vote on that proposition. It was stricken out in the House, but put in in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is in operation under an appropriation in the existing law, and it was a Senate amendment which was put in by the House by a vote on the floor of the House. The conferees on the part of the House did not agree to it, and brought in a partial report.

Mr. MANN. That was last year.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Thereupon a Member of the House made a motion that the House recede and concur.

Mr. MANN. That was last year.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. And it is now in the law by vote of the House.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Now, as to that amendment, a number of the Members of the House would not want the Senate to recede from this amendment without a chance to vote for the amendment in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am perfectly willing to bring it back.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER named the following conferees: Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and Mr. GOOD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article that appeared in the New York Times on February 21, entitled "An analysis of the election returns of 1914."

The SPEAKER. What was it published in?

Mr. GOOD. In the New York Times.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article from the New York Times analyzing the vote of 1914. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a poem sent by a person in my district on the subject of "The Flag."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a poem written by one of his constituents on the subject of "The Flag." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, February 24, 1915, at 12 o'clock noon.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out section 21, beginning at line 14, on page 56.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Before we proceed to the consideration of that question I move a reconsideration of the amendment, on page 28, striking out line 13 to line 21 and inserting line 22 to line 3, on page 29. I desire to have the Senate reconsider it for the purpose of disagreeing to the Senate committee amendment, leaving the text just as it came from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate committee amendment, commencing on line 13, page 28, and ending on line 3, page 29, was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I now move that the Senate disagree to the committee amendment, so as to let the House text stand.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question now is on the amendment of the committee striking out section 21, on page 56.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I trust that this amendment proposed by the Senate committee will not be agreed to. I realize, I think, that there are financial embarrassments connected with the administration of the Post Office Department, but we all hope that they will be temporary. In any event, it seems to me that it is a very unwise thing for the Senate to try, by reducing the pay of the rural letter carriers of the country, to recoup losses which may have been sustained. It may be a trite saying, but it is nevertheless true, that the Post Office Department is the one department that comes closest to the people. The people have been exceedingly pleased with the Rural Delivery Service, and I doubt if anything that this Government has done in many, many years has been more conducive to the general welfare and happiness of the people than the establishment of the free rural delivery.

It is an open secret that the Postmaster General believes that it would be best to abolish the present carrier service and resort to the contract system. It is probably true that a saving could be made to the people if that were done, but it is equally true that that kind of a saving would be false economy and would not, in my judgment, be approved by the people themselves.

When this system was established, and for many years thereafter, a discretionary power was left with the Postmaster General, by reason of the fact that the salary limit was fixed in the language, not to exceed $300, $400, $800, and so forth, and in the last act not to exceed $1,200 for a standard route of 24 miles. The Postmaster General, feeling that he could accomplish an economy to the Government, has ruled during the last year, and under the law creating the increase of a year ago to $1,200 as the maximum for a 24-mile standard route, that he could impose conditions upon the carriers which will enable him to reduce that salary on many routes of 24 miles, sometimes to a considerable extent; and if he could reduce it a dollar, under his conception of the law, he could reduce it so low that the rural carrier's life would be intolerable, that he could not carry the mail on the route, and that the contract system would be at once established.

Mr. President, I do not believe that when we increased the maximum salary last year to $1,200 there was any other thought in the mind of a single legislator but that the Postmaster General was to pay every man who served a 24-mile route the maximum sum of $1,200; but that has not been done during the last year. There has been an artificial standard fixed, based upon the amount of mail carried, and other elements, all of which are exceedingly unsatisfactory and entirely unscientific. They can not be so based with any degree of justice to the carrier, because the amount of weight changes weekly and monthly, and sometimes daily. Are we going to change the pay daily, weekly, and monthly in order to comply with this artificial standard which shall be fixed by the Postmaster General? I submit, Mr. President, that that is entirely impracticable and that it is a blow, and a disastrous one, to the rural service itself.

I am so thoroughly convinced of the necessity and of the wisdom of free rural delivery that I am seriously protesting against continuing further this discretionary power in the hands of the Postmaster General. If the old law had been interpreted as we supposed it was to be interpreted, and as it had been interpreted during its existence, I would have no objection; but the Postmaster General, I repeat, has insisted that he has the power, and he has exercised that power, of fixing the salaries upon a basis to be determined by him.

Mr. President, a few years ago—I think it was not to exceed two years, anyway—we raised the salaries of the carriers and said we were going to give them an official status; that they were under civil service; that their status was fixed so that there should be no more juggling with it. I say to you what I have said to the carriers, that I believe we have now reached the point when we have provided to pay the carriers all that the conditions of the country will warrant us in paying them for some time to come, perhaps for years; but, that salary being fixed, I do not want it changed by an executive official, by a department head. I want the will of Congress to be carried out, as it was expressed in no uncertain language.

Furthermore, we have been adding to the duties of the carriers. We have established the Parcel Post System, which imposes additional duties upon the carriers, and at this time, with those additional duties imposed upon them, are we to say that their salaries shall be reduced when the natural argument would be rather in favor of increasing them? But let us make that status sure, so that there can be no mistake about it.

It is no reflection upon the Postmaster General that we shall put these terms in the law, because he has construed the law contrary to the intent of the Congress, although he has done it probably legally under the terms that were employed, but not under the practice, not under the wish or the desire or the intention of Congress itself.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that this plan of the Postmaster General to impose artificial conditions, such as weight, is absolutely unreliable. I have here scores of letters from rural carriers. I am not going to give their names or addresses, because I do not wish to embarrass any of them with the department; but I think it will not be disputed that in the application of the rule that has been laid down by the Postmaster General during the last year there has been grave injustice done even as between carriers out of the same office.

A carrier who serves a 24-mile route or more, whether he carries a load of a quarter of a ton, or of 100 pounds, or even less, must maintain the same equipment. His operating expense is the same, whatever weight he carries. One carrier puts in the same time as another; he puts in the time which he has contracted to the Government; he has the same number of horses, the same number of rigs, and he is subjected to the same expense as any other carrier of mail out of a particular office. Therefore it is an injustice, I say, to impose artificial restraints which can not be checked up and which can not be established on any scientific basis.

These men write me letters in reference to the matter, pointing out the defects of the system that has been adopted by the Postmaster General. I understand, Mr. President, that the Postmaster General asserts that, if this discretion is not left with him, if he can not reduce these salaries as to him seems best, he may be obliged—his statement even amounts almost to a threat—to discontinue some of these routes, to make them triweekly or less often than once a day. Mr. President, I can not imagine that the Postmaster General would do such a thing. Certainly no such threat or suggestion should influence the action of Senators in the performance of their duties. There are other sources of revenue, there are other expenses of the Post Office Department which should be considered before we undertake to retain money that belongs to the carriers, the men who are working day by day in carrying the mail in the rural districts.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to suggest this: The Senator refers to letters he has received from carriers. I have received a great many letters from men who are not carriers in defense of the rights of the carriers. This is not only a question of compensation of the carriers, but, even if it amounts to an expenditure over and above receipts, it is the one expenditure that goes to the people themselves, to the homes of the farmers and the people who live out from the cities.

I am in hearty accord with the suggestion of the Senator that there are other sources from which this amount may be made up, if it is necessary to make it up. The Rural Carrier Service is the one thing that goes to the homes of the American people, and their best interests, as well as justice to the carriers themselves, require that the service shall not be curtailed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Minnesota for his suggestion. I was saying that if it were necessary to make receipts meet the expenses of the Post Office Department there are sources where money could be raised, and where it ought to be raised, which would involve no injustice to anybody, but when have we undertaken before to say that the Post Office Department must in all of its branches be self-supporting or revenue-producing to the Government? Why, we are told that the Rural Delivery Service is an expense to the Government, that we are losing millions of dollars each year; that we do not receive by millions—probably by $20,000,000; I do not know what the figure may be; it is variously stated—as much as we pay out. Mr. President, if the second-class mail privileges of this country were adjusted we might receive into the treasury of the Post Office Department twice as much as we lose through the Rural Delivery Service. I have felt for some time that the Government should impose upon second-class mail matter what it costs the Government to haul advertisements through the mails. If we did that, we could reduce the first-class letter postage one-half, and we would receive enough money in addition to offset any loss that would come to us through the Rural Delivery Service or of any other service of the department.

The rural delivery, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has stated, is the one system that the people want. It is their system, expanding year by year; and, with the growth of the parcel post, if it is extended, as we hope it may be extended, the time will soon be here when the rural carriers will have to occupy their whole time and supply themselves with additional equipment, and the present salaries which they receive will largely be exhausted in supplying that equipment.

But, Mr. President, I think that most of us understand this situation. I think this is a bad place to come in and attempt to make a saving in the expenses of the Government by reducing the pay of its employees. We are imposing additional burdens upon the carriers; we gave them last year an increase of salary, with the idea that their status would be fixed, that they were all to be affected, and that they would have a standing on the civil-service roll that could not be affected; and just as that has been established it is now proposed to put in the hands of an executive officer the fixing of salaries contrary to the wishes of Congress itself, thereby placing it in his power to abolish the Rural Free Delivery Service, if he wishes, so far as the carrier system is concerned, and establishing the contract system in its place. Such a change is possible under the unbridled discretion proposed to be given to the Postmaster General.

Mr. President, unless some Senator desires me to do so, I do not care to put into the RECORD the letters from carriers and letters from others who, as the Senator from Minnesota has suggested, are not carriers, but who are interested in the Rural Delivery Service——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Because, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, I have no doubt that every Senator on this floor has received similar letters and knows from his own experience just exactly what the conditions are in his own State.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very glad to know that the Senator from Michigan takes the position he has taken. I wish to add to what he has so well said, that it is the people in general who are interested in the Rural Free Delivery Service. In the section of country from which I come the rural carriers are really the ones who are the least interested. Many of our routes are more than 30 miles in length; we have many routes which are 33 miles in length; and the farmers of our State have to pay the carriers additional in order to get them to carry on the service. That has been done ever since the Rural Free Delivery System was established.

Now, does the Senator from Michigan know of any other class of people who are doing more for their country at this time and have done for it at all times than have the very class of people from whom we are now trying to take the service to which they are entitled? We hear a great deal about the people and the advice given to the people that they should go back to the farm. The rural free-delivery system is one of the features that has made the farm attractive, and I am very glad to know the Senator from Michigan has taken the position that we should provide by law what the carrier shall receive. The Postmaster General has arbitrarily fixed the salary of carriers. It makes no difference to them whether they carry 500 letters or a thousand letters; they have to make the long trips; they have to devote all their time to the service; and they should be paid in accordance with the law enacted by Congress. I believe it is a mistake for us to make this appropriation in a lump sum and leave it to the discretion of the Postmaster General to fix the salaries of these men who so well earn the salaries that they receive.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, before the Senator closes I desire to say that I assume the Senator has not taken this occasion to make a set speech, but has brought up this matter for such additional information and illumination as may be given it. Assuming this, and not caring to speak upon the subject myself, I am going to ask the Senator to allow me to make a statement at this time in connection with his remarks that I admit would go beyond the ordinary limits of a mere inquiry. It is this:

In the Northern States of this country, where the winters are long and the farmers somewhat stormbound, there has been a remarkable degree of melancholy bordering upon and often termed insanity, undoubtedly very largely due to the lonely life of the farmer; and especially the farmer's wife, shut in as she is in her isolated home during the long winter months. I am credibly informed, although I have not had time to verify the figures, that it is a fact that since the introduction of the telephone and the rural free delivery to the farm homes of the Northwest the statistical insanity has absolutely decreased about 40 per cent, undoubtedly due to the opportunity for the interchange of views, the social contact through the medium of the telephone, and the daily receipt of the daily newspapers.

I thought that fact would be of value, and perhaps appreciated, in connection with the argument the Senator is making.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do appreciate, Mr. President, what the Senator has stated. I do not believe any considerable number of people in the United States will dispute for a moment the proposition that nothing has done more to uplift and make more tolerable rural life than free rural delivery. I am not going to spend any time arguing that proposition. I am going to beg the question, if you call it begging the question, and assume that that is so, and that nobody is disputing it. The arguments in favor of it are so overwhelming that it seems to me there can not be two sides to it.

Mr. President, this proposition of the House does not add to the appropriation bill. It does not add a dollar to the appropriation as it was intended by Congress—not a dollar. It simply says that this money shall be spent as Congress intended it to be spent. Is that an unusual thing to ask of Congress—that inasmuch as the Postmaster General has interpreted the law differently, Congress shall assert again in unmistakable language just what its intent is? That is the proposition before the Senate.

I think that this amendment, if it is adopted, should go in on page 30, at the end of line 10, in connection with the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. There are some things in connection with it that may need a few changes after it is adopted, if it is. I shall speak about that a little later; but, as the Senator from Minnesota has suggested, I have no intention of making a set speech, and I am not going to make one. I am simply calling the attention of the Members of the Senate to things they already know. I am only sorry that we have not a majority of the Senate present here so that we can briefly submit this matter to them and they may understand exactly what the situation is; but I hope we are all sufficiently impressed with the importance of the case to make no change, at least at this critical time, and especially no change which may eventually result in an abolition of the carrier service in the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I shall detain the Senate only a short while to express my views in connection with this amendment.

I have always been a staunch friend of the Rural Free Delivery Service. I was on the Post Office Committee that reported the first $10,000 for this purpose. I have watched its growth. I am one of those who believe that the estimates of deficiency or loss occasioned by the rural delivery are mistaken. Ever since rural delivery has been established the Government has been more self-sustaining than before in connection with its postal receipts. In charging up the rural delivery they do not credit it with letters that emanate from sources off the rural delivery route. I am satisfied that nothing has done more to develop the country, to make country life pleasant, and to make the country progress than the Rural Delivery Service. I think anything that would impair that service would be a great calamity to the entire Nation.

I have always been opposed to putting the rural delivery carriers under the contract system. About 10 years ago we had a terrific fight in the House of Representatives over a proposition to let the carriers be put upon the contract system. After nearly two weeks' debate, though all the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads except two members—myself and Mr. Comer—reported in favor of the contract system, Congress, by an overwhelming majority, decided that the rural carrier system should not be put to contract.

The mistake of putting it to contract is that the carrier delivers the individual letters. He handles your mail. He handles your packages. It requires a man of character to have that responsibility and that power in handling anyone's mail. There is a vast difference between carrying mail in pouches under the star contract system and delivering it specially by carrier, who must be a man of character, a man with the confidence of the community, and a person that you think will deliver your mail promptly and properly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator if the star-route carriers do not distribute mail on almost every star route in the United States?

Mr. SWANSON. They do it on the request of the patrons. It is delivered only where the patron himself expresses confidence in the star-route carrier. As I understand, it is not compulsory.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me ask the Senator again whether it is not almost universally the practice for star-route contractors to deliver the mail to every patron on their routes?

Mr. SWANSON. The carrier makes that contract; but I understand that if a man has not confidence in his star-route contractor he does not ask him to deliver his mail. In addition to that, the rural carrier sells stamps, and also issues money orders.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to say in that connection that there are star routes where that is not done, namely, the delivery of the mail to individual persons.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, so far as this amendment is concerned, the House and the Senate at the last session of Congress fixed up almost unanimously what they considered a fair compensation for the rural carriers. There had been a system by which this was estimated. We reached the conclusion that, on account of the parcel post, and on account of the increased cost of taking care of the horses, wagons, and expenses incident to rural delivery routes, a salary not exceeding $1,200 was fair to the rural carrier. There has been no diminution in the cost of operating these rural delivery routes. Consequently I am satisfied that the salary fixed a year ago is just and proper, and is not too large. The House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote, though it was subject to a point of order, brought in a special rule and fixed in this bill the salaries that we thought the rural carriers were entitled to 12 months ago.

I am satisfied that that is right. It was the will of Congress, it was the desire of Congress and its expectation, that these salaries would be given. They have not been given. The department had a discretion which precluded, in the exercise of that discretion, certain rural carriers getting the increase that was anticipated by Congress. Now, the House amendment does this. I shall vote to retain the House amendment in the bill. I believe it is right; I believe it is fair; I believe it is just to the carriers. I can see no reason why the rural carriers' salaries should not be fixed equally with those of the carriers in cities and the clerks and other employees of the Government. The disposition of Congress has been to exercise its judgment, its will, its thought, and its convictions as to the salaries to be paid its employees. The House bill does this; and I will vote for a provision that will let Congress fix the salaries of rural carriers as it fixes the salaries of other employees of the Government.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. The appropriation asked for by the department this year was, in round numbers, $299,000,000. The bill as passed by the House carries $321,000,000, in round numbers. In other words, if the appropriation asked by the department had been granted, the bill would have been about $22,000,000 less than as it was reported to the Senate. The Senate committee undertook to reduce the amount of the bill as passed by the House, and did so, by some $3,000,000. Among the changes was one to do away for this year with the automatic annual compulsory promotion of post-office clerks, letter carriers, and railway mail clerks. After the bill was reported to the Senate there came from these three classes of employees protests in large numbers, so many that it was thought advisable to call back together the Post Office Committee, and that committee receded from the action it had taken in so far as the annual promotion was concerned, thus giving back about $3,000,000. The Senate sustained that action.

There is involved in this controversy $2,700,000. If the House provision contained in section 21 prevails, you must add to this bill $2,700,000.

Mr. President, this is not an ordinary year. There are unusual conditions. I do not believe the Government should conduct any branch of the service for the purpose of making money. I believe the men should be paid a reasonable wage for reasonable service. But it is no secret—the Post Office Department does not undertake to withhold from Congress the information—that if this bill is passed, carrying over the estimate of the department $22,000,000 or $25,000,000, we are going to face an enormous deficit in the Post Office Department.

This post-office delivery service is a great business in all its many branches. It is confronted now by conditions brought about by the war and by other causes. Like any other business man engaged in conserving the interests of the business he represents, the Postmaster General says to Congress: "Gentlemen, this is a year in which we ought to economize."

Senators speak as if the Postmaster General was the enemy of the rural carriers; yet, Mr. President, he has established in two years over 1,500 rural routes. The record he has made in establishing rural routes will compare favorably with the record of any prior administration.

It is interesting to note that there are more applications for the establishment of additional routes than there are routes in existence. The total number of routes in existence December 1, 1914, was 43,814, and the total number of applications to December 1, 1914, was 66,945.

It is all very well, Mr. President, to speak of carrying this service into the country to the farmer, but you render it impossible for the department to do so when you place a burden upon it that the Government itself can not carry.

Now, what is all this row about? When the Parcel Post System was adopted in 1913, the rural carriers were receiving $1,000 a year. By reason of the fact that weight would be added to the loads they would have to carry, the Congress raised the salary to $1,100. In August, 1913, the Postmaster General again increased the weight limit, and Congress was appealed to again to raise the salaries of rural carriers and it did so; it raised the salaries to $1,200. But in every appropriation act since the rural service has been established the law has said that the Postmaster General shall pay "not exceeding" whatever the actual salary happens to be. Under that law, reading to-day as it has always read, and as it will remain unless section 21 is adopted, there is discretion given the Postmaster General to pay less than the annual salary stated because of the words "not exceeding" the salary authorized.

I believe I will state the position of the department, because I think it is only fair the Senate should have that when it is considering this question. The Post Office Department said you raised the salary $100 a year because weight was to be added, because it was thought the parcel post would increase the weight so greatly that an increased salary would be justified. Again when the weight limit was increased the salary was increased. Because of what? Because it was supposed that the weight limit, the weight of the sacks or boxes or whatever the carrier had to take with him, would be enormously increased. The Postmaster General said, "Now, then, if that was the purpose, wherever that has happened I will pay the maximum salary, and I will pay between $1,100 and $1,200 in proportion as weight has been added to the carrier."

It is shown in this report of the House committee those who receive $1,100 and the graded allowance up to $1,200. As stated here there are 43,818 carriers. There are given the full routes of 24 miles. The number of those who now receive $1,200 is 6,208; 1,404 receive $1,188; 1,631 receive $1,176; 1,982 receive $1,160, and so on. I shall put the statement in without reading it. It shows 33,286 carriers are involved, but that 6,208 are now receiving the full salary of $1,200.

$1,104	1,607
$1,112	2,956
$1,116	2,045
$1,124	1,852
$1,128	2,191
$1,136	1,849
$1,140	2,363
$1,148	35
$1,152	2,044
$1,160	4
$1,164	1,982
$1,176	1,631
$1,188	1,404
$1,200	6,208
Total	33,286

Mr. President, it is easy to say that we are the friends of the rural carriers. I suppose everybody is; but there are other people to be considered. If you raise the salary of the rural carrier so high that the department will refuse to establish any routes where they are needed, I want to know who is benefited. No rural carrier, because he will not have any job; and yet you leave the people entitled to this service without it simply because the department feels that it can not pay the high salary Congress has insisted it should pay if it does establish the routes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course it is true that an increase was made in the salaries of rural carriers; but is it not also true that we increased the amount the railroads should receive 5 per cent in the last Post Office appropriation bill? We have heard no complaint about that; that is, so far as I am concerned, I have heard no complaint.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I appreciate the full significance of the question asked by the Senator from North Dakota. Congress authorized an increase of not exceeding 5 per cent because of the parcel post, and the department itself has never paid quite 5 per cent, but almost. I do not think anybody would say that if the railroads were being paid a proper rate at the time the parcel post was put on they should not be paid a little more money after it was placed upon them.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a joint commission of Congress, constituted of Members of the Senate and House, after an investigation of over 20 months, have come to the conclusion that, without considering the parcel post, the railroad companies were underpaid. I am not entering into that. They can take care of themselves.

So communities that are entitled to additional routes will not have them if you make it so burdensome that the department can not provide them.

So far as I am concerned, I do not hesitate to say that, as between the employment of one man at $1,200 and the denial of service to hundreds of people along a rural route, while I will remember the carrier, I will not forget the people entitled to rural-delivery service.

Sir, in the city in which I live the department, after investigation, has recommended three additional rural routes. A community has sprung up there off the railroad, without a post office, where 1,200 people want their mail. Will you tie down the department so that it can not put in that route?

Let us see what benefit this is going to be to the rural carrier. The chances are that by the inclusion of section 21 in the bill for that class of employees the rural carriers are being done an unintentional injury, and it will not take very long to find that out. Now, let us see. I undertake to say that the Postmaster General ought to save a deficit if he can. Pass section 21, and it is still within the power of that department to abolish routes. It is still within the power of the Postmaster General to reduce the frequency of delivery. You may say that on a standard route of 24 miles for daily service he must pay $1,200. He may say in reply, "I can save this money. I will reduce the frequency of delivery upon that route and make a triweekly service, and where the man is getting $1,200 he will hereafter get $600."

Mr. President, routes can be abolished, and they will be abolished. The department does not say that it will do that, but it would be justified in many instances in doing it.

This matter was before the Post Office Committee, and at first they decided to allow section 21, which fixes the rigid and invariable rate of pay. The Postmaster General asked for a hearing and came before the Post Office Committee and stated facts that in my opinion justified the committee, and will justify the Senate, in allowing the law to remain as it is. He pointed out to us that in a certain congressional district of this country there is a county with rural routes around every section of land running north and south and east and west. Take 24 miles, the standard route, and if one of these carriers has 22 miles and people living half a mile or three-quarters of a mile away are in the habit of coming to the road along which he passes to their letter boxes and get their mail, it will enable the rural carrier to increase his salary by having enough mileage added to make it 24 miles, and therefore a standard route. What does he do? He says, "Get up a petition by which I can come right by your house here and deliver the mail to you. Fix up a petition to your Congressman and I will bring it right to your door." Naturally the man falls in with that suggestion and gets up a petition, his neighbors sign it, and on a route of 22 miles somebody living a little farther off will petition Congress to make it a standard route, and you will have what is known in the department as a "tracer." The carrier will be going along the road if it is a mile to his house, and he will have that put on his route; he will go that mile and back and that will be credited to him in the standard route making the 24 miles. There are innumerable instances like that.

Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any use to undertake to argue this question. Congress seems willing to allow these rural carriers to name their salaries. I do not think, in the first place, it will operate to increase the amount. The Postmaster General stated before the House committee that if permitted to let out by contract this service he could do for $35,000,000 the same work, and as efficiently, as it is being done to-day at an expenditure of $54,700,000.

Now, sir, grant that these are worthy men. Grant that they are entitled to consideration at the hands of the Government—and I grant it—ought we for the sake of 43,000 men to inconvenience the millions of people who would get their mail, and who can not get it if Congress is going to yield to their demand and increase their pay? This is the year of all years in which the Post Office Department has the right to appeal to its employees to allow the pay they now receive to remain one year more. This is not the last year. This is not the last appropriation bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I wanted to ask the Senator from Florida a question just for information. I know the Senator from Florida has given this matter very careful study, as he gives to all questions with which he has to do. Is it not true that before any rural route is established it is inspected by a Government inspector and that it is practically laid out by a Government inspector?

Mr. BRYAN. I think that is true.

Mr. GRONNA. Now, how could it be possible for a rural carrier to establish a route in the way the Senator from Florida just described?

Mr. BRYAN. Just in the same way that it is possible for them, organized as they are, to come here and raise annually the Post Office appropriation bill from four to five million dollars for their benefit.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator knows, of course, better than I do that the routes are increasing every year. There are many routes desired in my State, I want to say to the Senator from Florida, that should have been established more than a year ago. I can say that of my own personal knowledge. But they have not been established.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me say to the Senator from North Dakota that in his State on December 1 there were 584 routes, and there have been, all told, petitions for 898 routes. If you make it so the department can not operate except at this tremendous loss, not one of them will be established and perhaps all of them ought to be established.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from Florida has given great thought to this subject, and he is speaking upon it in a very interesting and instructive way. I want to ask him to put into the RECORD just the amount that will be saved at this time by permitting the law to remain as it is.

Mr. BRYAN. Two million seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator inform me further as to whether there has been any retrenchment or reduction in the expenses of the department anywhere else except in this service?

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, yes; I think several appear in the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator recall to what department or service it applies?

Mr. BRYAN. Let me say to the Senator from Mississippi there are a number of instances, as he will see by examining the bill. But this is no decrease in the salary of a single man in the employment of the Rural Service to-day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is a decrease from the salary intended to be fixed by Congress.

Mr. BRYAN. It is not the decrease of salary of a single man. It is saying to the Postmaster General that you can not grade these salaries between $1,100 and $1,200, and you must pay them all $1,200.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If I am not interrupting the Senator, I should like to ask him further if he was not surprised in the statement of the Postmaster General when he assumed the right to interpret the law in this way and refused to pay the salaries as they were fixed by Congress?

Mr. BRYAN. I was, Mr. President, because usually the maximum provided for was paid. But I can understand that the Postmaster General, in making his rate for the parcel post with a certain salary in view, could not expect those rates to be self-sustaining if the salaries were increased $5,000,000 a year. He could only expect to make two or three millions dollars at his own figures, but if you let him make that and then increase the salaries of the rural carriers, of course he can not do it.

Mr. President, it is undoubtedly true, I think the facts will demonstrate it, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] knows, that the great bulk of the parcel-post packages never reach a rural route at all. They go between the cities. Sixty per cent are mailed out from Chicago and New York. So the feeling that this is going to add very greatly to the weights they have to carry has no foundation in fact, or very little.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator states, and I think probably fairly, I know intentionally so, that there has been no salary reduced, that no man has received less pay than he has heretofore received. May I ask the Senator if the carriers have not been receiving during the last year less salary than Congress intended that they should receive when it increased the salary to $1,200?

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Michigan is just as well able to reach a conclusion upon the question as I am. He knows the law as well as I do. He knows the law has always read "not exceeding" the annual salary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true, but——

Mr. BRYAN. The Postmaster General had a standard rate of $1,100, and when last year it was increased to $1,200 he thereupon graded the salaries between $1,100 and $1,200 in proportion to the weight and the length of time it took to make the trip.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But that had never been done theretofore.

Mr. BRYAN. Twelve hundred dollars had never been paid.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; but that rule had never been applied. Let me ask the Senator this question. The Senator said that there had been no salary reduced. If Congress approves the action of the Postmaster General in adopting these arbitrary rules, is it not possible for the Postmaster General to reduce the salaries even below $1,100?

Mr. BRYAN. That is possible; but, Mr. President, the Postmaster General appeared before the committee and stated that he had no such purpose and would not do it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator from Florida if the Postmaster General has not always had that authority since the Rural Delivery System was established?

Mr. BRYAN. Always. I stated in the beginning the law has always read not exceeding the annual salary. The words "not exceeding" have always preceded the annual salary.

Now, Mr. President, just one word. I make this prediction: I am not an enemy of the rural carrier, but, if I were his enemy, I do not know how I could better show it than to vote to adopt section 21. Some of their salaries will be taken away altogether and others will have their salaries reduced one-half. I make that prediction.

Mr. President, is it supposed that the Postmaster General will stand idly by and see a deficit mounting up into the millions accrue when he has it in his power to stop it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator another question? The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] asked the question as to whether there had been any curtailment in Government expenses elsewhere. May I ask the Senator from Florida whether, in his judgment, the discretionary power exercised by the Postmaster General in reference to the parcel post, the abolition of the second zone, the increase of weights and the decrease of rates, has not tended to make that deficit in the Post Office Department?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator from Michigan wants to ask me embarrassing questions this morning.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I certainly do not wish to do so. I will state it in this way, if the Senator will permit me, that I believe the Postmaster General's orders have had the effect of creating a deficit in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not care to argue that question at this time. The Senator from Michigan knows very well the position I took at the time the order making the change was made. One of the grounds of my position was that the Postmaster General did not have it in his power to fix the expense. He was trying to produce an income regardless of what the expenses of procuring that income would be, and I pointed out that the increase of a hundred dollars a year to the salary of each of the rural carriers would be $4,300,000 a year. I never questioned the good faith of the Postmaster General, and I do not question it now; but if he was wrong about that and I was right, or if he was right and those of us who believed otherwise were wrong, no good will come about by now discussing that question. He is right now, and I propose, if I can, to help him save this $3,000,000, in order that the deficit in the Post Office Department may be as small as possible; and, sir, I believe there is enough patriotism among the rural carriers to cause them to recognize the equity of the request to help the department stand the loss of this year, when business is disarranged and when the revenues of the department in all classes of mail matter have fallen off.

I recognize—I have seen it too often not to recognize it—the power of organized insistence for an increase of salary in Government positions. I know these men go into the rural routes; they discuss politics with the people to whom they carry the mail; they may influence them; they are organized, and the people out there are not. But, sir, you can carry a thing like that too far; you can carry it so far as to create an opposite opinion among the people who are now being served. A very good way to do that is to take away the service they are now receiving, in order that one man may receive a hundred dollars a year or forty or fifty dollars a year more, or they be deprived of getting their mail.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, there are some routes, more particularly on the Pacific coast, where travel is difficult, where the roads are bad, and where a compensation of $100 per month would be little enough for this service; in fact, it is not enough pay. There are, however, other portions of the country where, I presume, it would be good wages. If, however, the adoption of the amendment is going to result in curtailing the number of routes, and it remains in the hands of the Postmaster General to do that, I do not see how we would gain anything by making the minimum wage $100 per month, although in many places that would not be adequate compensation.

I was in favor of the amendment until I heard the explanation given by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. In a general way we ought to pay good wages and require good service for it, and we ought to economize and cut our expenses in other ways. There are many opportunities to do so in the expenditure of the moneys of this Government.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LANE. Just one moment. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator. The Postmaster General says there are postal clerks, letter carriers, and postmasters who are trying for positions as rural letter carriers and who are willing to resign the positions they now hold, which shows that that position is not looked upon as one of hard work for little pay.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, during the last year I have received many complaints from people living in remote districts of the State from which I come, that their mail star routes had been discontinued on account of the prices which were asked for carrying the excessive weight of the mail which now goes over such routes in comparison with what they formerly had to carry. The Postmaster General has discontinued the routes, or has failed to receive bids which seem to justify him in their continuance. We have had much complaint about that, and it is important that we appropriate enough money to deliver the mail to the people of this country. It is more important that we do that than that we do many other things for which we expend money.

The Senator from Minnesota called attention to the fact that in certain rural districts the percentage of insanity had decreased. Twenty-five years ago I made a report, as the superintendent of an institution, on that subject, calling attention to the fact that among the wives of farmers and their children, and among the settlers generally who lived in the isolated portions of the State, more particularly among those living in the heavily timbered districts, where roads are bad and trails almost impassable, where they were separated from communication and association with other persons, where the husband would break away perhaps once a month and go to town and stay all Saturday night, leaving his wife alone in a district where the darkness was so impenetrable after night set in that you could not see your hand before you, oppressed with a deep silence so oppressive in the heavily forested districts, where no sound breaks the silence aside from the scream of the panther, unless it was a storm, which in its turn was terrifying—among the people in those districts the percentage of insanity in proportion to population was perhaps double what it was in other communities where they had easy means of communication.

In such districts, under such circumstances, to the poor, pitiable mothers with little children, isolated, driven in upon themselves, with no associates, no sympathy reaching them from anywhere, the rural mail carrier, with his horse and cart and bundles, perhaps of shoddy goods or cheap ribbons bought from some exploiting firm in the East, came as a godsend, and the Government can well afford to pay the money to carry the mail to such people. In their behalf I would vote for this notwithstanding the $2,000,000 increase, hoping to cut expenditures in some other manner, if I thought it would accomplish that object, but if it is going to result in the Postmaster General reaching forth his hand and shutting down on the number of routes, I would be afraid to do so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] that it would be well that the Congress should be careful and discreet in making appropriations. The people in the South particularly are in a condition just now which makes it very necessary, if their interests are to be considered, that we lighten the burden of taxation, so far as it is possible to do so without impairing the public service; but I hardly think it altogether fair to make the cut solely upon the officers who serve that class of our population—the farmers—who bear the greater burden, who produce the wealth of the country, whose labor maintains its commerce in time of peace and the majority of whom give their strong arms to fight the Nation's battles in time of war. I can not see the justice of such a proposition. It seems to me that some people look upon the farmer as a mere thing to be used only to vote and pay taxes. That, I am sure, is not the view of the Senator from Florida. A more patriotic Senator does not sit in this Chamber than he.

The rural mail delivery is the one branch of the General Government service in which the country people are most interested, and by which they are more directly benefited than any other function of the Government. It has done more to drive away the clouds of ignorance and misinformation, it has done more to elevate the standard of intelligence, it has carried more light and comfort into the homes of the patient toiler of the rural sections than any other agency of the Government, and, while we ought to economize, I repeat I do not think it altogether fair to commence economizing on them.

I do not think the rural mail carriers get any more than they are entitled to. The hardships incident to the performance of their duties is too well known to need repetition here. I do not think that $100 a month is more than a man should receive who has to furnish his own team and do the work that the rural carrier has to do. When the carrier is well paid he is going to give better service; he is going to make it more convenient, more helpful to the people he serves. While, as I have said, I do not want to add to the burden of taxation, and I also think we ought to economize, I am not going to begin here. If there were a gradual cutting down of the salaries and reduction of the expenses of the Government generally in other departments, then I should insist on the rural carriers suffering a proportionate cut, but we are not doing that.

As a matter of fact, this Congress is almost reckless in its expenditures. Notwithstanding our platform promise, the last session surpassed any Congress within the history of the Republic in the magnitude of its appropriations. We have created commissions and fixed enormous salaries, provided for an army of minor officers and employees, and otherwise made demands on the Public Treasury which should be done only in times of unlimited prosperity. Every idea of economy seems to be thrown to the winds until we come to treat with the rural carriers, whose salaries are already less than they ought to be. I am very much more interested in improving the Free Rural Mail Service for the farmers of the country than I am in providing ships to be run in foreign commerce for the speculators and manufacturers. In the larger things, and in the service of other classes of our population, and the employees in other branches of the public service this Congress has been liberal to a point approaching extravagance. I am not going to vote to cut down the salaries of the rural carriers who are serving that class of our population that receives less favors at the hands of the Government than any other class and who contribute most to the support of the Government. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the labor that tills the soil is the source of all material wealth. To the farmer we look for the products that feed and clothe the world. Not only is it true that his labor is the source of all material wealth, but the manner of his living and his environments make him also the source of patriotism, unbiased good judgment, and dauntless courage—the indispensable elements which enter into and make up that healthy public sentiment which writes the laws of the land and maintains the institutions of the Republic. For these reasons I shall be compelled from a sense of duty to vote against the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, in connection with this subject matter I think it ought not to be forgotten that the burden and the work of the rural carrier are continually increasing. The burden and work of the carrier to-day are far and away greater than they were three or four years ago when the service was first instituted. That comes about very largely from the operation of the parcel post. The Congress and the country are committed to the idea of a parcel-post system, and the burden of sustaining that service, it seems to me, ought not to fall in any degree upon those engaged in the Postal Service. It ought to fall, rather, upon the country generally.

I took occasion to say in this Chamber a year or more ago that the operation of the parcel post, unless some relief was had, would do one of two things: It would either create a great deficit in our Post Office Service or else it would reduce the service from the high standard that had heretofore been set. That was not in the nature of a prophecy at all; it was simply a matter of business calculation and computation.

Now we are confronted by a deficit in the Post Office Service. It is costing more than we have appropriated for it, and it will continue to cost more than we appropriate for it. The operation of the parcel post alone constitutes an unknown expense that we can not estimate for, and I doubt very much whether the Post Office Department itself can tell to-day within many millions of dollars what the operation of the parcel-post system is actually costing.

We have that system with us. It is largely a matter of discretion—it has been so interpreted on the part of the Postmaster General—as to what service he shall perform under that system. I think it was not intended that it should be more than a system for distributing small parcels through the mails; but it has grown and grown, until now, in certain sections of the country, we are transacting something of a freight business, and we are doing it at less rates than are charged for actually freighting the same class of goods in the same localities. That is true, and nobody disputes it. There are many places in the West where a 50-pound sack of flour can be transported through the United States mails cheaper than it can be transported by a freight wagon or a freight train. I do not know that that can be avoided, but it is inevitable that somebody must pay for it.

I think we may well expect to increase appropriations for the Post Office Department until something is done to equalize the cost, but I do not think we ought to make that equalization at the expense of the men who are actually transacting the business, and on a standard route, where the carrier is furnishing his own team, his own conveyance, and giving his entire time to the service. I can not for the life of me think that in these days $100 a month is excessive compensation. I hope that the amendment of the committee will be disagreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WHITE. I was impressed with the argument of the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] to the effect that the Rural Free Delivery System should be extended, or, rather, I was confirmed in the view that I already possessed on that subject. He makes a strong argument in favor of extending this system. I quite agree with him, but I do not think it should be extended to the detriment of the public or at the expense of the men who are engaged in the service as rural carriers.

It has been stated by the Senator from Florida that if this amendment is adopted it will impose a burden of something over $2,000,000 upon the Treasury. No doubt that is true. Then, if the Treasury is relieved of that burden, some one has to bear it. Who will it be? It will be the carriers who are described in section 21 of the House bill, and who this amendment contemplates depriving of the benefits contained in said section. In other words, we will take from them, according to the Senator's view, about $2,500,000.

Is it proper that that burden should be imposed upon men who are receiving only $1,200 a year for six days' service a week, traveling a route of 24 miles or more, furnishing their own vehicles and their own teams, paying for the upkeep of the outfit, the feeding and care of the team? Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me that there can be no question that this economy should not be instituted at the expense of these men. Let it come from some other source, if it must come; but I say the economy should not be instituted so as to impair the service rendered to the public. The public are interested as well as these carriers. When you deny the laborer fair compensation for his work poor service must be the inevitable result. Fair compensation procures fair service. A meager compensation result in indifferent service.

Mr. President, this is one place where the money of the people is being expended for the people. There is no other expenditure made by the Government where the people receive as directly, as immediately, as proximately, as they do here the benefits that result from the expenditure. This is the people's money that we are spending. We are providing by it service for the people—immediate, direct service—and when we deny to its employees fair compensation we are injuring the public to the extent that the service is impaired.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption by way of a suggestion?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Post Office Service is about the only department of the Government which is expected to be anywhere near self-sustaining. The Naval Establishment, the Military Establishment, the Agricultural Department, the Forestry Service, all of them are creating every year what is termed in the Post Office Service a deficit, and the Post Office Service is far and away greater in magnitude and in importance and making for the well-being of the communities which it reaches than any of the other services. I think we ought not to be horrified if our Post Office Department is costing us a few million dollars a year outside of the receipts that we obtain from it.

Mr. WHITE. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WHITE. I will, if I do not lose my place on the floor.

Mr. BRYAN. I have no intention of taking the Senator from the floor.

Mr. WHITE. I know the Senator has not.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming will be remembered, and that if, because of the unusual war conditions which necessarily affect the activities carried on by the Post Office Department, a deficit is produced of from twenty to thirty million dollars some Republican will not arise hereafter and say that it was because of the extravagance of the Democratic administration and the appropriations made by a Democratic Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a deficit in the Post Office Service can be met in the same way that a deficit in the Agricultural Service can be met, or in the Forestry Service, or in any other service conducted in times of profound peace, when we do from year to year meet here and appropriate millions of dollars, without reference to any war, for sustaining the particular service for which the bill provides.

Mr. BRYAN. I shall await the outcome with much interest and with the belief that hereafter some man will rise and claim that there has been an enormous waste of money by the Democratic Congress, and point to the appropriation bill and to the deficit contained in it. During the last Congress, when Republicans were pointing to what they designated as extravagant waste, did any of them call attention to the fact that the expenditures of the Post Office Department, which increased by some $30,000,000, ought to be left out? If they had called attention to that item they would have shown that the appropriation was not large as compared with other years. My recollection is that it was included, however, and no claim was made that we ought not to consider the increase on account of the expenditures of the Post Office Department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Florida to misstate—inadvertently, of course—the position I take. I believe in the economical administration of all the affairs of the Government, but I think the Senator from Florida realizes that we can not expect to make a government self-sustaining. A government will not sustain itself. It must be sustained by taxes imposed in one way or another. When we are expecting no other department of the Government to be self-sustaining, how can we justly expect the Post Office Department of the Government to be self-sustaining?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, does not the Senator realize that the Post Office Department is perhaps the only department that is engaged in business?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, not at all.

Mr. BRYAN. What others are there?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why, the Agricultural Department. That department, in my State, is engaged in the business of manufacturing timber and selling hay, and doing a thousand other things. We do not complain at all when the Forestry Service of the Government runs three or four million dollars behind. We do not think anything about that; but when the Post Office Department begins to run a little behind, we must trim down to make it self-sustaining. How? By attempting to trim down the salaries of the men who are putting in six hours a day with their teams in the public service.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, of course it is delightful to hear these gentlemen——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not mean to interrupt him.

Mr. WHITE. I know the Senators did not mean to interrupt me, but their colloquy having become somewhat extended while I was on my feet, it occurred to me it would be more agreeable to listen to them while seated.

I am not particularly concerned, Mr. President, in the discussion as to what position my colleagues may be placed in by their respective positions on this question; that is far removed from the issue we are considering. The question is, Shall the Senate amendment be adopted or shall the provision of the bill as it left the House be allowed to remain?

The Senator from Wyoming is right in saying that we are taking a wrong view of this question when we are insisting that the Post Office Department, among all the departments of the Government, should be self-sustaining; that is, that it should return to the Treasury as much as it takes from it. Neither the Navy, War, nor any other department of the Government yields any revenue to be returned to the Treasury. They all take vast sums from it. That they are helpful can not be questioned, but their benefits are remote; to say the least of it, they make no returns in dollars and cents to the people.

The Post Office Department, as I have said, is the one branch of the Government by which the people are immediately and directly benefited. This great department that serves the people so well and so generally should not be stinted in order to effect economy, even if a deficit of a few dollars should result from its operation; why, I ask, should Congress become unduly alarmed and seek to destroy its efficiency by withholding needful appropriations.

Mr. President, I am surprised that there is not even a greater deficit. I am surprised that the Post Office Department yields as much money to the Treasury as it does, and that Congress is called upon to go into the Treasury to such a limited degree in order to sustain it. It is the people's department of the Government. Therefore, we should not stint the people in the expenditure of their money. This is their money. It is not ours. This expenditure will be for their benefit. There can be no doubt about their receiving the benefit themselves.

We are spending vast sums of money, Mr. President. There can be no question about that, but I am not criticizing it. We are spending and have spent hundreds of millions on the Panama Canal. It was a proper expenditure; but, sir, that was a gift of the people of the United States to the world. When we are bestowing upon mankind this magnificent gift from the people's money, should we hesitate about spending $2,000,000 to retain efficient service in which they are immediately and directly interested? I think not.

Then, another thing: The will of Congress should follow the expenditure of the people's money; hand in hand with its expenditure the will of Congress should go. It seems that unless this provision of the House bill is restored the will of Congress is to be ignored and the will of a department substituted for its will.

I prefer to accept the views of the Congress of the United States rather than the views of the head of a department, however efficient, when the people's money is to be expended in providing service for them. I am not criticizing this department of the Government; I think that it is being ably and well handled.

Who can say that $1,200 is excessive compensation for a man who has to provide his own team and vehicle, feed his team and keep his vehicle in repair, and serve a standard route of 24 miles or more six days in every week? He must be a man of at least some intelligence, intelligent enough to see that the mail is properly distributed over this route; see that every piece of it reaches its proper destination. He must be a man of integrity and character; otherwise the mail might not be faithfully and honestly distributed. He must have energy and determination. It requires a man of energy and determination to serve one of these routes six days in every week, encountering the vicissitudes of weather. He must be a man of strength and courage; he might be called upon to defend, at the risk of his life, the mail in his charge.

Shall men possessing these traits, these qualities, be driven from the service for want of reasonable and fair compensation? Shall men of inferior intelligence, men lacking in standing and caliber be substituted for them in order to economize even to save between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, when this service, covering the entire United States, is to be taken into consideration? I think not. The people of the United States are not calling for economy such as is sought to be instituted by depriving these faithful servants of theirs from receiving a fair and equitable compensation.

If economy must be practiced, we should not commence at the bottom, where the salaries are the lowest and the services are arduous, but rather at the top, where the salaries are large and the honor is greater.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. They have not been getting it during the last year. Has the Senator heard of anybody resigning?

Mr. WHITE. No, Mr. President, I have not. Possibly resignations were withheld hoping that promotions would be granted such as are sought to be denied by this bill unless the provision of the House bill is restored. Or they may have been withheld because these carriers, having given up other business or other occupations and having provided themselves with teams and vehicles to perform this service, could not dispose of them and find other employment. Possibly many of them may have remained in the service for another reason. They may have been men with families dependent upon them for their daily bread.

They may have had wives and children whose bodies had to be clothed and whose mouths had to be fed. These wives may have been sick, these children may have been small, and all of them absolutely dependent upon the carrier. Men surrounded by conditions like these could not resign if they would. Mr. President, neither have I heard of other Government employees resigning, such as officers of the Army or Navy, judges of the courts, or even Members of Congress, who, having given up their business or their callings, can not afford to resign, even if they believe their salaries were not as great as their earnings would be if they were following the occupations and callings which they had left.

For these reasons, Mr. President, among many others that I might advance, I trust that the committee amendment will be defeated, and that the provisions of the House bill will be restored.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the statement has been made by the Senator from Florida, a member of the committee, that the effect of fixing the salaries as they are provided for in section 21 of the bill as passed by the House would be to curtail the rural-route service or prevent its extension. I do not know whether that is a mere expression of opinion on the part of the Senator himself or whether it is intended as a statement of fact. I should like to ask the Senator what warrant he has for making that statement.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into the business of detailing private conversations. I place it upon the responsibility of the Postmaster General. What would the Senator from California do in the congressional district in Michigan where there is in one county a rural route around every section of land in it? Would he abolish any routes there?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, that has nothing to do, in my estimation, with the salary that should be paid to carriers. It may be that there are a great many rural routes established already that ought not to have been established and could not have been justly called for.

Mr. BRYAN. I will say to the Senator that some of them have recently been abolished.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly, and they may have been abolished rightly; but what I am insisting upon is that that should not depend upon the salary paid to carriers, but upon the question as to whether the people are justly entitled to that service.

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to me it can very easily be appreciated that when people have been accustomed to receiving their mail by rural delivery it would cause confusion, dissatisfaction, and protests to officials against the abolishment of that route.

Mr. WORKS. There is no doubt about that; but that simply calls upon the public official to do his duty as he sees it.

Mr. BRYAN. The question the Senator asked was if I thought any routes would be abolished.

Mr. WORKS. No; my question was, What authority did the Senator have for stating that the effect of fixing these salaries would be to curtail or prevent the extension of the service?

Mr. BRYAN. I can say, so far as the extension of service is concerned, the Postmaster General said he did not feel that he could extend it where it ought to be extended in many instances; and, as a matter of fact, he is not extending it any now. Although he has made a great many extensions since he has been Postmaster General within the last two years, that is all stopped now.

The department claims that some discretion ought to be left to it, and it seems to me it was the intention of Congress in the beginning to leave it some discretion. It is one thing to go over 24 miles of paved roads and another thing to go over rough roads the same distance. You can not correct that inequality if section 21 is adopted, because then the man on the most difficult route will get $1,200, where it will take him 8 or 10 hours to do the work, just the same as the man who will do the work on a paved road in 2 hours. Some discretion ought to be left.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, this question seems to be a very simple one, as I look upon it. The question should be whether the amounts fixed as the salaries for these rural carriers are reasonable and just compensation for the services rendered. If so, they should be paid that amount, and the Postmaster General should have no right to abolish any rural route or refuse to establish another because, in his judgment, the salaries paid are too high. That is simply a question of deficiency in the revenues of the Government. So far as I am individually concerned, I feel that the carriers should be paid a reasonable compensation for their services. If it should result in a deficiency, then the people of the country ought to be willing to make up that deficiency by way of taxation, as the extra or extended service is for their benefit.

The trouble about it is that we are attempting to determine this question of the compensation of the carriers by the amount that is necessary to carry on the whole Post Office Department, and the attempt here to economize by reducing the salaries of the carriers in the rural districts to prevent that deficiency which is, to my mind, entirely unjust.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that the Post Office Department might discontinue some star routes in the western part of my State, and, further, that the Post Office Department might refuse to put in operation some rural routes that have already been established in that State, because of a deficit either actual or anticipated; but, Mr. President, I am satisfied that the salary of $1,200 a year to the average carrier over the average standard route of 24 miles, considering conditions of roads, considering the work done by that carrier, is not too much, and that he should receive for that average distance traveled in carrying the mail and the work done; considering, too, the equipment which he furnishes, the sum of $1,200 for his work.

I should not object, Mr. President, to some discretion on the part of the Postmaster General, but when a maximum sum of $1,200 was suggested with a minimum sum, between which maximum and minimum the Postmaster General might exercise some discretion in fixing compensation on account of the condition of the roads or on account of the weight of the mail carried, the suggestion was not taken kindly to; but it appeared that the Postmaster General wanted the broad discretion to fix the salary anywhere from $1,200 on down without any limitation.

Mr. President, I think this is too wide a discretion to give the Postmaster General. It is more a matter of legislation than administration to fix these salaries. If they are not to be fixed within certain reasonable limits, then I favor the compensation as fixed by the House. For the reason that the committee amendment gives the Postmaster-General too wide a discretion, I am opposed to it and am in favor of the House provision.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have, perhaps, followed the development of the rural carrier service as closely as any Member of this body. I have been a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for nearly 18 years, and during a large part of the time I was chairman of the committee. When I was assigned to duty upon the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads the appropriation was considerably under $100,000,000, but so rapidly was this service developing that the committee viewed with alarm the time when the annual appropriations for this strictly business end of the American Government would pass the $100,000,000 mark. The comparatively brief period of 18 years marks a gigantic development in the history of the Post Office Department. From eighty or ninety million dollars of annual appropriation 18 years ago the present bill, according to the committee, aggregates the sum of $317,948,869.

The business of the Post Office Department is to a great extent a barometer of the business of the country. Its extraordinary development is a measure of the commercial growth of our country during the last 18 years.

The rural carrier service was started in a small and humble way after prolonged discussion and agitation. It was thought that it might furnish temporary employment to a farmer or the son of a farmer who might in a desultory way carry the mails through the rural districts. As no one dreamed 18 years ago that the expenditures of the department would be over $317,000,000 to-day, so no one dreamed when the seed was planted for the Rural Delivery Service that in a very few years, much less than 18 years, a period represented by a decade, the appropriation would exceed considerably over $50,000,000 for the Rural Service.

Yet, Mr. President, not withstanding the great doubts which were at the time entertained by many sincere men as to whether this service was not likely to cost more than it was worth, and was not a luxury that was really not demanded by the people, and would entail a lavish expenditure; notwithstanding the fact that the actual expenditure and appropriation has exceeded the enormous total of over $50,000,000, there is not a Member of this body who would raise his voice to abolish it or curtail it.

The employees of the service have grown from badly organized and untrained young men, who were first enlisted to carry the mail, into a well-trained, well-disciplined responsible body of rural carriers, who, in my opinion, are as hard working, conscientious, honest, and deserving a class of postal employees as any in the service of the American Government. Their responsibilities are very great. The standard route is supposed to be 24 miles. In I think over 50 per cent of the cases it is much over that.

I am informed on responsible authority that 50 per cent of the routes in operation are in excess of 24 miles, and that quite a large number are 30 miles, and some 36 miles, and some even more in length.

These rural carriers are exposed to all the inclemencies of weather. They are out every day. The mail has to be delivered. They are at their own expense for horses and vehicles, very largely, and no one who has investigated their condition can, in my opinion, reach any other conclusion than that these men are not overpaid in any of the schedules under which they work.

I received, I think, in the first session of this Congress, when I made a careful investigation of this matter, nearly 1,500 or 2,000 letters from rural carriers, chiefly in Pennsylvania. These letters were written by the men themselves. They were intelligently written. They were written in considerable detail, giving most intresting facts regarding the various character of roads and highways, from the good macadam road or the asphalt boulevard to the dirt road which was nearly impassable in the springtime, from the level country to the difficult roads over the Allegheny Mountains, details in regard to the strain and stress on the horse and on the vehicle, common-sense statements which, if I cared to burden the RECORD or occupy the time of the Senate by reading even some of these communications as a sample, would persuade every Senator—aye, and convince him—that these men are worthy of all that Congress has heretofore done for them.

Originally, by the act of April 21, 1902, the Postmaster General was authorized to classify the Rural Delivery Service and fix the compensation of the employees in such service. That was one of the earliest efforts to bring into a disciplined organized army this great body of efficient and industrious postal employees. It was my pleasure, as I have said, and my opportunity to participate in that early legislation.

Then in 1912, 10 years afterwards, another distinct step in the development and advancement of this branch of the Postal Service was made. After years of representation by the rural carriers and their friends, after a decade of experimenting, the salary was made by the act to which I have referred, which provided that letter carriers of the Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,100 per annum.

Then another step was taken. I ought to remind the Senate, Mr. President, that this progress was slow, that 10 to 15 years have been taken in the careful investigation, in the thorough discussion, in the committee of the House and committee of the Senate, and in long-drawn-out and often bitter contentions in conference committees of the two Houses on the Post Office appropriation bill to bring about a steady development on the lines which we now have embodied in the laws of Congress.

This growth has not been hastily taken. It is the mature thought and conclusion of men of great experience in the House and Senate concerning postal matters, and following out those conclusions and the experience of years the act approved March 9, 1914, provided:

> For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, $53,000,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations: Provided, That on and after July 1, 1914, letter carriers of the Rural Delivery Service shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

So it was the final and best thought of Congress, the conclusions of the two committees of either branch of Congress, the most recent verdict that these men should receive a maximum salary of $1,200. No one familiar with their duties, as has been stated earlier in the morning by several Senators, who have spoken on this question, can contend for a single moment that that maximum salary is too large for the man who has to cover a route from 24 to 36 miles in length, in many cases exposed the greater part of the year to inclement conditions of weather and on roads that are often nearly impassable.

But notwithstanding this decision of Congress by men who would be admitted to be experts by nearly anyone in either branch of Congress, on account of their years of familiarity on either of the committees in the House or Senate, the Post Office Department, and I have no doubt that they had the best intentions in the world, although I disagree with them, proceeded to nullify absolutely the purpose of Congress.

I have here the order of the Postmaster General, dated November 4, 1914, in which an effort is made to modify the schedules based on the length of route by a schedule based on the pieces of mail per month and the pounds of mail per month, an arbitrary and, in my judgment, an entirely unjust schedule, so far as the carriers are concerned. It is impossible to make any fair estimate based on the number of pieces carried. These vary with the seasons. During the Christmas holidays they are almost beyond the strength of the ordinary man, and at other seasons of the year they fall off very much. The number of pieces or the pounds of mail per month might not come up to the maximum fixed by the department's order, and yet the carrier is compelled to travel his route whether it be 4 miles or 34 miles, and feed his horse, pay for the repairs of his vehicle, and go ahead every day, regardless of whether he is doing a large amount of carriage or a small amount.

I will ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks the order of the Postmaster General fixing the schedules based upon pounds of mail per month and pieces of mail per month, in order not to take up the time of the Senate by reading it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Order No. 8451.]

NOVEMBER 4, 1914.

Order No. 8246, of July 14, 1914, is amended to read as follows:

On and after November 1, 1914, the compensation of rural carriers shall be based upon the length of the routes, the time required to serve them in accordance with the authorized official schedules, and the number of pieces and the weight of mail carried as shown by the records of the department.

The rates of pay shall be computed and fixed according to the following schedule:

Schedule.

Length of route.	Salary base.	Pieces of mail per month.	Pounds of mail per month.
4 miles and less than 6 miles	$480	3,000	400
6 miles and less than 8 miles	528	3,700	490
8 miles and less than 10 miles	576	4,400	580
10 miles and less than 12 miles	624	5,100	670
12 miles and less than 14 miles	672	5,800	760
14 miles and less than 16 miles	720	6,500	850
16 miles and less than 18 miles	840	7,200	940
18 miles and less than 20 miles	960	7,900	1,030
20 miles and less than 22 miles	1,080	8,600	1,120
22 miles and less than 24 miles	1,152	9,300	1,210
24 miles and over	1,200	10,000	1,300

An increase or decrease of $12 per annum shall be made for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds, respectively, greater or less than the schedule, with an allowance of $12 per annum for each closed pouch or closed sack of mail carried per day, and also for each full mile of route served in excess of 25 miles in length: Provided, That no carrier shall be reduced in compensation below the schedule in effect June 30, 1914, because of this order, and that $1,200 per annum shall be the maximum salary.

A carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the combined length of the two routes.

In addition to the foregoing the following are hereby established as the official time bases for serving routes, and shall begin with the time of leaving and end with the time of return to the office or station.

LENGTH OF ROUTE AND TIME BASES.

Twenty-four miles and over, six and one-half hours a day.
Twenty-two miles and less than twenty-four miles, six hours a day.
Twenty miles and less than twenty-two miles, five and one-half hours a day.
Eighteen miles and less than twenty miles, five hours a day.
Sixteen miles and less than eighteen miles, four and one-half hours a day.
Fourteen miles and less than sixteen miles, four hours a day.
Twelve miles and less than fourteen miles, three and one-half hours a day.
Ten miles and less than twelve miles, three hours a day.
Eight miles and less than ten miles, two and one-half hours a day.
Six miles and less than eight miles, two hours a day.
Four miles and less than six miles, one and one-half hours a day.

When under the present or future schedules as fixed by the department additional time is required to serve any route, the carrier shall be entitled to $12 per annum for each one-half hour thus authorized in excess of that named in the time base.

The compensation of carriers on newly established routes shall be at the rates in effect June 30, 1914.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, the question before the Senate is on disagreeing to the committee amendment and to restore section 21 as it came over from the House of Representatives. This provision of the House bill is, I believe, identical with an amendment which I introduced in the Senate as early as August 17, 1914, providing for the salaries of rural carriers. I have not compared the House provision with my amendment with sufficient care to say that it is absolutely the same, but it is based upon the same principle, and for all practical purposes they are identical. I will ask to have this amendment, presented by me long before this question came up for consideration in the pending bill, inserted in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

That on and after July 1, 1914, the compensation of each rural letter carrier for serving a standard route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum, payable monthly; on routes 22 miles and less than 24 miles, $1,152; on routes 20 miles and less than 22 miles, $1,080; on routes 18 miles and less than 20 miles, $960; on routes 16 miles and less than 18 miles, $840; on routes 14 miles and less than 16 miles, $720; on routes 12 miles and less than 14 miles, $672; on routes 10 miles and less than 12 miles, $624; on routes 8 miles and less than 10 miles, $576; on routes 6 miles and less than 8 miles, $528; on routes 4 miles and less than 6 miles, $480. A rural letter carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half of the combined length of the two routes: Provided, That, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum: Provided further, That the salaries of rural letter carriers shall be based on the length of route served, regardless of the number of pieces or pounds of mail handled.

Mr. PENROSE. Perhaps the clearest statement that could be made of the reasons against departing from the schedules fixed by the House of Representatives and giving this very great and unlimited power to the Postmaster General to classify these employees and expend as he may see fit, on classifications of his own or on a system of star-route contracts, the enormous sum of money appropriated for this service, can be found in a communication addressed to me as a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, from W. D. Brown, editor of the Rural Free Delivery News. This paper, I am informed, is the official organ of the National Rural Letters Carriers' Association. It is the official organ of the rural carriers of the State associations and also the official organ of hundreds of county associations of rural carriers. It represents very largely and, I take it, officially the views of the 43,000 rural carriers in the United States. I call the attention of the Senate to a very careful consideration of Mr. Brown's communication. The letter is not very long, and I ask the Secretary to read the communication.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

RURAL FREE DELIVERY NEWS,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1915.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg leave to call your attention to one feature of the Post Office appropriation bill which, as a member of the Senate Post Office Committee, I would like to have you consider favorably.

Last March the Senate amended the Post Office appropriation bill, fixing the pay of rural letter carriers at $1,200 per year for standard routes of 24 miles or more in length, and a proportionate increase for routes of less length. This amendment was concurred in by the House and became a law. Anticipating the increased salary, many rural carriers purchased new equipment so as to make a more creditable appearance and render more satisfactory and efficient service. This increase was expected to become effective July 1, 1914, but instead of following the established schedule, as Congress manifestly expected him to do, the Postmaster General adopted a new basis of compensation for carriers, which withheld about 65 per cent of the increased pay intended by Congress.

When the Postmaster General's course became known the House took prompt action, and on August 10 passed a bill fixing rural carriers' pay specifically upon 2-mile gradations and removing all discretion from the Postmaster General. This provision was included in the railway mail pay bill, which now awaits action by the Senate Post Office Committee and was intended to become effective at the beginning of the current fiscal year, July 1, 1914.

The Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1916, as passed by the House, also definitely fixes rural carriers' pay on 2-mile gradations, and I respectfully ask your support of that provision, making same retroactive and to become effective July 1, 1914, in harmony with the action of the House.

I respectfully submit that the new schedule of pay arranged by the Postmaster General, which includes three separate units, namely, length of route, number of pieces of mail handled monthly and weight of same, is unfair. Furthermore, I have received a large number of complaints from carriers to the effect that even this new schedule is not being faithfully observed.

Carriers are required to provide all their own equipment and to cover their full routes daily, regardless of weather or road conditions, and mileage and average road conditions throughout the year should be controlling factors in the adjustment of the pay. It makes little difference to the carrier whether his daily mail be large or small, but the length of his route and condition of his roads have an important bearing upon the durability and cost of repair or replacement of his equipment. When a wagon breaks down or a horse dies the cost falls upon the carrier alone. Many such casualties occur each year.

It has been asserted that rural delivery service is conducted at a loss of $40,000,000 per year. Based upon the system of computation now in use, that claim may be true. At present rural carriers are only allowed credit for mail collected on their routes and carried to the post office for dispatch or delivery. When it is understood that such collections do not equal 20 per cent of the mail carried from the post office for delivery on their routes, it will be seen that any such basis of calculation is entirely unfair. Farmers may telephone orders to local merchants for desired articles and have same forwarded by parcel post. The carrier handles all such parcels, but is allowed no credit for same. Is this fair?

You may not be aware that recently the Postmaster General arranged a new schedule for rural delivery, fixing the maximum time on a route of 24 miles or more in length at six hours and one-half. As about 50 per cent of the number of routes in operation are in excess of 24 miles, quite a large number being 30 miles and some 36 miles and even more in length, it is plain that this time schedule will add greatly to the equipment cost of rural letter carriers. Horses and vehicles can not stand the strain.

The volume of mail handled by rural carriers varies at different seasons of the year, and to adhere strictly to the Postmaster General's present scale of pay would necessitate frequent readjustments. Carriers are liable to be penalized for conditions for which they are not responsible, and I respectfully submit that in fairness to them a straight-out salary scale, such as has been passed by the House, is far better than the Postmaster General's plan. It will require no additional appropriation for the current fiscal year to fix the salaries as Congress intended. The House already has passed a bill giving all rural carriers a level increase in pay of 9 per cent and making same effective July 1, 1914, the beginning of the present fiscal year, and I earnestly solicit your support of this measure in the carriers' behalf.

Thanking you in advance for your interest, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

W. D. BROWN.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, before I proceed further—and I do not intend to detain the Senate much longer—I want to call particular attention to the proviso in the amendment which I have been permitted to insert in the RECORD, introduced, as I say, by myself as early as August 17, 1914, providing for the salaries of rural letter carriers, because I think this amendment is worthy of the very serious consideration of the Senate, and I hope ultimately will be followed by proper action in line with the suggestion contained therein by legislative enactment in some future appropriation bill. I call particular attention to the proviso in the amendment, which reads:

Provided further, That the salaries of rural letter carriers shall be based on the length of routes served, regardless of the number of pieces or pounds of mail handled.

Mr. President, it has been the custom in the last six months to blame a great many of the evils in the body politic upon the war in Europe; and I observe in the report of the committee that one of the reasons stated for the proposition of biennial promotions was that some $2,500,000 would be saved, and would help provide for the deficit caused by the falling off in postal revenues due to the war in Europe. The committee on this point says:

In view of the statements of the Postmaster General made to the committee concerning the marked falling off of the postal revenues due to the war in Europe, and the apparent necessity for economy in the Postal Service, the committee adopted the recommendation relating to promotions of post-office clerks, letter carriers, and railway postal clerks, that after July 1, 1915, these employees should be promoted from the lower to the higher grades after having served in such grade two years instead of one year, as at present, making a saving in this item for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, of $2,760,000.

Then there is a statement by the Postmaster General, as follows:

Biennial promotions: The scale of salaries established by law for the compensation of post-office clerks and letter carriers is not so arranged as to stimulate the most efficient service on the part of the employees or to secure to the Government the full advantage of their promotions. A closer adherence in this regard to the methods and practices in the business world is desirable. The compensation of these governmental employees is now and will naturally continue to be much higher than the commercial scale of wages for like services. The present practice of advancing all employees automatically at annual intervals to the grade carrying the maximum salary has a deleterious effect on the efficiency of the service, as promotions come to be regarded as matters of course, and the employee so quickly reaching the highest grade and lacking the years of experience and training necessary to fit him for promotion to supervisory duties becomes dissatisfied and careless. The present promotions are made within certain grades annually and carry salary raises of $100. It is believed that these substantial advances should be reserved in each case as the reward for not less than two years of efficient service, and accordingly it is recommended that the promotions now made annually be made biennially, and that no post-office clerk or letter carrier be promoted before he has served at least two years in the next grade lower than that to which he is promoted.

Mr. President, the proposition of biennial promotions in the opinion of the Senate yesterday was clearly that the effect was deleterious, and the bill as it now stands retains the same old system of annual promotions as heretofore in the three branches of the service referred to—post-office clerks, letter carriers, and railway postal clerks—but, in view of the fact that the committee states the falling off in the postal revenues is due to the war in Europe, I would ask the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] for a moment, and inquire of him—I was not able to be present at the meetings of the committee as often as I should like to have been—whether there was any estimate of the amount of such falling off in the postal revenues due to the war in Europe.

Mr. BRYAN. The statement was made that for the month of January the revenues had fallen off 8 per cent from those of January, 1914.

Mr. PENROSE. That is, of postal revenues distinctly to be credited to the foreign mail? Do I understand that?

Mr. BRYAN. The postal revenues for January, 1915, lack 8 per cent of being as large as they were in January, 1914.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, how much of that falling off was due to the war in Europe?

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator can form his estimate as to that as well as can anybody else. The fact was stated that beginning in August, 1914, the revenues began to be less than they were in the corresponding months of the preceding year; but that up to August——

Mr. PENROSE. I can easily understand that, Mr. President,

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the Senator will let me answer, as he asked me a question.

For years the normal increase in a month over the corresponding month of the preceding year had been from 4 to 7 per cent. The Postmaster General stated that the department had enjoyed that normal increase month by month until the month of August last, and that in the month of August the revenues decreased from the revenues of August, 1913, 1.12 per cent; in September the decrease was larger; and it has been growing greater every month, with the exception of December, when, on account of the holidays, the deficit over the preceding December was only 4 per cent, but that in January, 1915, the deficit showed 8 per cent. If that runs throughout the year we are bound to have a very large deficit.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to concede the facts as the Senator has represented them, but I say, with the greatest respect for the Senator's knowledge of this bill—which is more comprehensive perhaps than mine, because he has been a diligent member of the committee and belongs to the party in control of legislation in this Congress—I do not feel that my question has been answered.

I admit the deficit, but I want to know what foundation there is for the statement made by the Postmaster General, as embodied in the committee's report, that it is due to the war in Europe. If it be due to the war in Europe, I want to know whether it is all due to the war in Europe; or, if not, what percentage is due to the war in Europe.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Postmaster General did not make an argument as to the cause of the deficit. He was stating the facts to guide the committee in the preparation of the bill. We did not discuss with him the causes which produced the deficit, but we were confronted by the fact.

Mr. PENROSE. The statement is boldly made, Mr. President, that the marked falling off in revenues is due to the war in Europe. Now, nearly everything is being blamed on the war in Europe.

Mr. BRYAN. If the Senator will pardon me for a suggestion, I suppose the conclusion was arrived at in this way: That until the war in Europe began the normal increase that has existed for many years existed in the year 1914 and continued to exist until the month of August, when the war in Europe commenced.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand the Senator from Florida to agree with the Postmaster General in the statement to the committee that the marked falling off of the postal revenues is due to the war in Europe? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I do not know that it would be of any benefit to the Senator from Pennsylvania to have my opinion, but I have always understood that the Post Office Department was a very accurate barometer of the conditions of business and that in times of depression the revenues of the post office have invariably fallen off.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator, I do not feel that I am much more enlightened than when I began my inquiry. The statement is made that the falling off of the postal revenues is due to the war in Europe, that consequently the greatest economy must be exercised in the Postal Service, and that it must be exercised to the detriment of post-office clerks, letter carriers, and railway postal clerks, whose compensation and status and standards of service and of living have been developed by 18 or 20 years of consistent effort, the mature thought of men in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, and that they are to be made to suffer for the war in Europe.

Mr. President, I am somewhat tired of hearing everything blamed on the war in Europe. We are not at war; we are supposed to be going ahead with our business affairs as a nation at peace, jealously guarding our neutrality.

Is no inference to be drawn concerning this deficit in the soup house and in the bread line in the city of Philadelphia and elsewhere; in the nearly 700,000 or 800,000 men out of work or only working on half time in the State of Pennsylvania, and thousands more in other States; in the universal prostration and curtailment of industrial activity; in the fact that there is hardly an industrial concern in the State of Pennsylvania that is running at more than 40 or 50 per cent of its maximum capacity, and that business enterprise and initiative are absolutely paralyzed in the American Republic? Is that due to the war in Europe?

Under date of February 19, we read:

> Two hundred hotels in New York City to-day made arrangements to give free meals to men out of work.

Is that due to the war in Europe? I do not intend to delay the discussion of the appropriation bills by a tariff argument, but we have heard for months that the beneficent operations of the Underwood tariff law were suspended by reason of the war in Europe, and that elections are to be carried in the future by the party now in power on account of the war in Europe. Now the Postmaster General comes along and says that the post-office clerks and letter carriers and railway postal clerks are to have their high standard lowered and their comfortable condition of living and their efficiency, which have been brought about by years of mature thought on the part of men familiar with the situation in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, interfered with on account of the war in Europe.

Mr. President, in my opinion the deficit in revenues is due to the prostration of business in the United States. That is a condition which we must face; but it furnishes no argument for visiting the unfortunate results of this condition upon the helpless postal employees, who are compelled to go ahead and discharge their responsible duties, upon which the business life, the social intercourse, and the very circulation of the lifeblood of the community depends.

There is nothing gained by having cheap postal employees. I reached this conclusion long ago in my study of the question as a member and as chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. There is nothing gained by having cheap employees or by having discontented, dissatisfied, and overworked employees, but there is a distinct gain in having the vast army of many thousand men engaged in these responsible employments contented, loyal to the Government, and ambitious to discharge their duties faithfully.

It is generally admitted that there is no branch of the Federal Government the employees of which are so strictly held to the mark as in the Postal Service. In other departments of the Government in ordinary times many employees may be laid off, many of them may be sick or off on a holiday and the Government does not suffer materially; certainly any delay in the routine in the department might be made up by a little activity later on; but the postal employee, the letter carrier, the railway mail clerk, the man who distributes the mail in the post office, must be on his job every day of the 365 days of the year, either in person or by competent substitutes.

The mail must be delivered; the lifeblood of the social and business community must circulate, and it pulsates through the arteries of the post office. The men in that branch of the service have a responsibility to meet such as the employees of no other branch of the American Government have to meet. Its thousands of men from the West Indies to Alaska and Manila, in every climate and in every manner of employment, have burdens and responsibilities thrown upon them which are not thrown upon the employees of any other department; and I say that these men are the last of all the employees of the Government who should be degraded in their occupations and in their salaries on the pretense that it is necessary to do so because of conditions growing out of the war in Europe.

The Post Office Department is the business end of the Government, and it should be made as nearly self-sustaining as possible; but that it should be entirely self-sustaining is not essential. It is more essential to have employees well paid and contented and efficient than it is to have the department self-sustaining. The department can not always be self-sustaining. The aim is to keep the deficit down as low as possible and in some years not to have any deficit at all; but in taking up new problems, in taking up postal savings banks, the Rural Delivery Service, and the parcel post, which in their inception must necessarily be experimental, it is impossible that every year, year in and year out, the Post Office Department should always be self-sustaining. That has not been its history in the 130 years of its usefulness, and I, for one, am not alarmed if the department occasionally from year to year during a decade or more shows up on the wrong side of the ledger; but I do think that efficiency should be the first aim of everyone who legislates concerning the Postal Service.

If greater revenues are necessary, if it is finally thought that we should secure greater revenues from the Post Office Department, it should not be brought about by a mistaken economy which undoes the development and the work of 20 years, and it should not be brought about at the expense of post-office clerks, letter carriers, and railway postal clerks—the latter of whom often administer their duties at the peril of their lives—but it should rather be brought about by increasing the postage on second-class mail matter or by revising the schedules of the parcel post, or in other ways which will bring about the needed revenue.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report from the Committee on Appropriations, without amendment, the fortifications appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Florida, from the Committee on Appropriations, reports a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21491) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19006) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the Washington Post of a few days ago, and it is in marked contrast with what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has just said. I want to read some of the headlines and a few of the items conveyed in telegrams from many of the cities of the United States. The first headlines relate to a dispatch from New York City, and are as follows:

Big trade rush begun—New York textile buyers tell of widespread prosperity—1915 will be record year—Central West leads with business boom, but extraordinary recovery from the war scare is reported from all sections, including the South, where demand is general.

In the same paper, Mr. President, there are contained a number of dispatches from other portions of the United States, and I want to call attention to the headlines of just a few of them. The following is from Cleveland, Ohio:

Rush of war orders—Cleveland gets contracts for $17,000,000 in supplies—Motor trucks in demand—One factory turning out $3,000,000 worth of wire—Knit goods sales to belligerents total $2,417,000—England buys $150,000 worth of field glasses.

A telegram from Rhode Island has the following heading:

Textile mills report biggest gain in decade.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. An item from Elizabeth, N. J., is printed with the following headline:

Full time for 9,000 at sewing-machine plant.

The following headlines precede a dispatch from New York City.

United States shipyards rushed with orders for vessels.

The following dispatch from Chicago is in the same paper:

ENTIRE GARY PLANT OPEN; 2,000 RETURN TO WORK.

CHICAGO, February 13, 1915.

With the starting of the rail mill, all departments of the Gary plant of the Illinois Steel Co. are now in operation.

From Pittsburgh comes a statement preceded by the following headlines:

Ask bids on 1,000,000 shells for England.

From Sharon, Pa., comes a statement with the following headlines:

Mills start to work on 1,500,000 pairs of socks.

Then, from Chicago, comes a dispatch preceded by the following headlines:

Italy buys 600,000 pairs of American blankets.

The following headlines are at the head of a dispatch from Philadelphia:

France orders 100 American locomotives.

From Connellsville, Pa., a telegram is prefaced by the following headlines:

Three thousand three hundred and fifty-five more coke ovens fired by Frick Co.

The same copy of the Washington Post also contains this item:

FACTORY EXPORTS JUMP HIGH.

* * * * * * *

A statement by the Department of Commerce Tuesday shows that in certain lines of manufactures, however, exports made phenomenal gains compared with December a year ago. Among the more notable increases were: Commercial automobiles, from $101,000 to $3,333,000; cotton knit goods, $295,000 to over $2,000,000; woolen clothing, $183,000 to $1,333,000; other woolen goods, including blankets, $103,000 to $2,725,000; rubber boots and shoes, $84,000 to $864,000; sole leather, $354,000 to $3,600,000, and upper leather, $1,750,000.

Zinc increased during the same period from 137,000 pounds to 36,666,000 pounds, while metal-working machinery increased in value from $1,350,000 to $2,432,000.

Surely the Washington Post can not be said to be an administration paper, and yet in this one paper of February 14, 1915, I find 15 statements made of enormous increases in various lines of production, a condition which evidently would reflect itself in the number of men employed and in the steady employment which follows. Now, I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall not comment on the condition of mind which would boast about prosperity based on the agony of Europe. The orders to which the Senator has referred are for munitions of war and for clothing for millions of men engaged in destroying each other among the civilized nations of Europe. A large body of our citizenship in the United States would urge legislation absolutely to prohibit the exportation of such munitions and articles of destruction, murder, and slaughter which are going over to the other side. Yet the Senator stands here in the Senate of the United States and boasts that his party is bringing on prosperity in the American Republic by sending to Europe the means of destruction or clothing for men exposed to the wintry blasts in the trenches in Germany, Russia, and France. What kind of prosperity is it, Mr. President? A temporary meretricious condition which does nobody any good, which is haphazard in its nature, which may be a relief to starving men who were out of employment six months before the war was ever dreamed of. It may be a slight improvement over the soup house or the bread line, but of no permanent value. It is based on a condition of war which may end to-morrow, which is likely to end in a comparatively short time, which can not last forever, and when it is over, if the present fiscal policy shall be continued, we will face black ruin in the United States so far as American industry is concerned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, from the comments of the Senator, one would think that the Democratic Party had brought on this war. We had nothing whatever to do with the war. We have tried to mitigate in every way possible the severities of the war. The Senator, however, has been complaining that people are out of work, and that there are soup houses, and I wanted to show that in just one recent issue of the Washington Post, which can not be considered an administration paper, there are some 15 or 20 statements from all sections of the country showing an enormous amount of increase in the manufacture of products and the opening of factories.

I want to say to the Senator, in reference to the tariff policy which he has always advocated, that there never was so high a protective tariff as now exists by reason of the war, because imports are nearly prohibited by the fact that there is war, and consequently American factories are in a position to have no competitors whatever. But it seems to me that these statements that are made here in the Washington Post, not from any one section of the country but from any number of sections of the country, in only one paper, show that there is an enormous advance, which indicates a great prosperity that we are bound to have for the year 1915.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. The motion pending before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to agree to section 21 of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives and disagree to the committee amendment striking out that section. I am in favor of the motion and shall vote for it, and I earnestly hope the Senate may adopt it.

A year ago the Congress of the United States undertook to establish the salaries fixed in this paragraph of the pending bill for the rural letter carriers of this country. It employed language which left the Postmaster General some discretion. It provided that the salaries should be not exceeding the figures named in the present section of the bill. Acting under that authority, although the legislative intent, considering the practice of the departments of this Government in construing acts of Congress, was that the carrier should receive the salary fixed in the bill, and not less than that, the Post Office Department did not give the salary that Congress clearly intended to establish.

It seems to me that when it comes to establishing the salaries that the employees of this Government are to receive, any class or any number of employees in any branch of the service, the will of the Congress of the United States ought to be controlling, and that it is not a matter of departmental or Executive discretion. The salaries established in this bill are reasonable. They are not excessive compared with the salaries of city letter carriers, and when you consider that these rural carriers have to pay for the expense of furnishing their vehicles and horses the salaries are relatively lower. It seems to me that the Senate could do no better than to agree to the carefully worked out proposition of the House. It is a matter of simple justice, and of tardy justice, too, to one great class of our employees, and a deserving class at that.

Mr. President, I feel that in any event this matter would have received this direction in conference. Knowing as I do the temper and desire and disposition of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I believe that our conferees could have been relied upon to provide absolutely and distinctly for this branch of the Government service, and to see that these carriers received the pay that we intended they should get a year ago, and that we are determined they shall have now. But after all, since the House proposition has been carefully worked out, I think the safest plan is to agree to the motion made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and agree to the section as proposed by the House, and it will afford me great pleasure, when the motion is put, to vote in that way.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say just one word about this provision.

When we increased the pay of the rural carriers to $1,100 per year and to $1,000 per year it was based upon the 24-mile limit as being the usual length of the service required. We felt that that was not enough, and we finally raised it to $1,200 per year. I then introduced an amendment, which passed the Senate, providing that in no case should it be less than $600 per year, so that the pay would range from $600 to $1,200 per year, it being understood that the $1,200 would take the highest mileage with 24 miles as the basis, and that the least amount would be $600, and that the difference between the lowest and the highest should be a gradual scale upward to the $1,200, when the carrier reached the 24-mile limit.

It seems, Mr. President, that the Postmaster General, disregarding the intent of Congress at the time, has made rules that bring into operation other elements to determine the amount of the salary or pay than the question of mileage, and it is determined somewhat by the weight and the number of packages. That this is certainly a very novel and a very poor method of arriving at a service I think anyone must admit who will give the subject the slightest consideration. The question of the character of the roads is a thousand times more important in determining what the pay should be than the question of the number of packages or the weight.

If a letter carrier should pass between this city and Baltimore, he would find a splendid paved road all the way; and to say that because he took a few more packages in weight than some one who attempted to pass in the springtime for the same number of miles over an ordinary Virginia road, carrying almost nothing, would seem to the average person to verge upon the ridiculous. But we could not make the condition of the roads the basis, so we did the very next best thing we could do, and that was to fix upon the matter of mileage; and we ought to have a system which we would compel the Postmaster General to adhere to that should be based solely upon mileage.

My own view is that there should be nothing less than $600 per year, because there is no route so short that it does not require one-half a day of a man's time, and the longer routes can not require more than one whole day. Therefore, we ought not to have anything less than $600. It requires a team of at least one horse and a vehicle to make the very shortest route. It requires at least three horses and probably two vehicles to make the longer routes, if we make allowance in bad weather for a change, for repairs, and so forth; and in the northern sections of the country, where we have long winters, we must have both the sleigh and the wheeled vehicle, so that it would absolutely require two kinds of vehicles in that section of the country.

When we take into consideration the cost of the feed for the horses, the care and repair of the vehicles, the shoeing of the horses, and when we realize that taking an average of 20 miles per day year in and year out, the average horse will not last over four years of active service, and that the carrier must buy another horse every four years, we will realize that the amount we are paying is exceedingly low compared with what we pay for those engaged in city delivery.

I would be in favor of making $1,200 the basis of a 24-mile route, and proportionately increasing the amount above $1,200 for any number of miles above that. I would also be in favor of making a minimum of $600, and then making a gradual scale from the $600 up to the $1,200; but as we probably will not be able to carry that through, I should favor the provision that we probably can carry through, it having passed the House, and that is the provision which has been stricken out by the action of the committee.

I certainly shall support with a great deal of pleasure the motion made by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I send to the desk a letter from a rural carrier at Glenview, Ill., which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GLENVIEW, ILL., February 22, 1915.

Hon. JOSEPH L. BRISTOW,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I note that the Senate committee, in dealing with the Post Office appropriation bill, has left the Postmaster General's salary plan for rural carriers untouched. I just want to say that I am very glad this has been done. I have been a rural carrier nearly 10 years, have had both light and heavy routes in four States, and I want to say that the present arrangement of compensation for the rural boys is all right and ought not to be changed. It is the best thing the service ever had. I hope the committee will not pay too much attention to Mr. W. D. Brown, editor of the Rural Free Delivery News. Mr. Brown is against the order because the majority of the associations seem to be. Mr. Brown gets $531 a year from the association, besides individual subscriptions. I sent three letters to the News for publication, each letter being an expression of good will toward the new salary order. Not one letter was ever published. I am forced to the conclusion that Mr. Brown suppressed the letters because he wishes to make it appear that the entire carrier body is against the department. However, Mr. Brown does not reflect the attitude of all the carriers by a long shot. In closing, let me again say that I am heartily in favor of the present salary plan and hope it will continue. I am not, of course, in favor of the contract proposition, but I can not believe that will happen.

Thanking you for your attention thus far, I am,

Yours, very truly,

W. W. BEARLY, Carrier No. 1.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, this controversy is in regard to the assignment of the last appropriation. I do not question the fact that it was the expectation of the carriers to receive an increase of $100 for each standard route of 24 miles and a corresponding proportion of $100 for the shorter routes. Now, all that the Postmaster General did in apportioning this increase was to take into consideration the question of weight of mails as well as the distance traveled. This controversy is simply a question as to whether the adoption of the parcel post, which in some instances imposes a great deal heavier weight of mails upon the rural carriers, shall be considered in adjusting their compensation. Heretofore the element of weight has not been taken into consideration, because it was not of so much consequence.

The facts are that the average weight of the rural carrier's mail, up to the adoption of the parcel-post policy, was only something less than 25 pounds per day, and of course the difference between 25 pounds or 20 pounds or 15 pounds was not sufficient to justify the department in taking into consideration the weight of the mail which the carrier handled; but when heavier packages were intrusted to the mail and the volume and weight of the mail became an important factor, then he felt in justice to the rural carriers that that element of service ought to be given consideration in fixing the compensation. While he did not reduce any salary as it existed prior to this advance authorized, he did adjust the $100 advance so as to give the carrier who carried a heavy volume of mail a little more than he gave the carrier who did not have a heavy volume of mail.

I think he was justified in doing so, and I do not believe that any criticism against the Postmaster General in regard to this order is justified. I say he had a right to take into consideration that fact, because it was alleged on the floor of the Senate time and again during the debates that this additional compensation of $100 ought to be given because additional demands were being placed upon the carriers because of the Parcel Post System. If that is true, then on a route where there was practically no additional burden the Postmaster General had a right to consider that fact. Congress did not, by mandate, order him to give the full increase that was justified, and so he construed it. Politically speaking, it might have been wiser for him to have let the matter go as it formerly had gone, give everybody the proportionate advance which the $100 would give them, and say nothing about it; but in the discharge of his duties, having in view the equitable adjustment of compensation, it seems to me that no criticism should be made upon him for taking into consideration this new element of service which Congress had imposed upon these carriers.

The question as to whether or not $1,200 a year is enough for a rural carrier is not the question involved here. The question as to whether or not the rural service is a good service is not involved here, because there is no Senator who does not believe that the rural service has been a great blessing to the rural communities of the United States; and those Senators who try to make it appear that the Postmaster General, in this adjustment that he has made has done so as the enemy of the Rural Delivery Service, in order to curtail its usefulness and its desirability, do him an injustice and put him in an improper light.

I can say this with absolute frankness, because I have not been supporting the Postmaster General in a number of his policies. I do not belong to the same political party that he does; but when he does that which I believe is equitable and just, not only to the carriers who deliver the rural mail but to the revenues of our Government, I believe he is entitled to the support of any Senator who believes that he has done his duty and done it well. So far as I am concerned, whenever he does what I think is right in the administration of his department I shall stand by him and support him to the best of my ability.

It has been said by Senators here that this effort to readjust these salaries, this method of taking into consideration the weight and the volume of the mail, will have a tendency to cripple and limit the service. I was surprised to hear Senators say that. They certainly have not studied the effect. Say that we appropriate fifty-two or fifty-four million dollars, or whatever it may be. There are now, according to the statement submitted here by the junior Senator from Florida, the correctness of which I do not doubt, 66,000 applications for rural routes pending in the department, while there are something over 43,000 in existence. There are 25,000 more applications for additional service than there is now service in existence.

I believe the Congress should pursue a policy which would enable the department to extend this service into the territory where it does not now exist. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] is absolutely right when he says that if we make this service so expressive, if we make the cost of establishing a rural route so great, the department will not be justified in extending it as far as it could be if conducted at a less expense.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Where does the Senator get his information that there are 20,000 applications now on file for Rural Delivery Service?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] made the statement that there are 66,000 applications on file now in the department for rural routes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BRYAN. I will say to the Senator that after going over a table I understand that the total number of petitions is 66,945, and the total number of routes is 43,818, which would make 23,000 more petitions for routes than have been established.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, the fact is that there are not to exceed 2,000 live applications on file. That includes all the applications from the beginning of the service down to the present time. Many of them have been merged into the others and satisfied by the establishment of rural routes taking them in, so that to-day the good, bad, and indifferent applications on file do not exceed 2,000.

Mr. BRYAN. The others have been rejected.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Michigan may think that the whole country is covered with rural delivery routes, but I know it is not, and he will find that to be the fact if he will examine into the facts. I know that in my own State there are vast territories where there is no free delivery, where we would like very much to get it. I know that there is a vast territory in that State where there is a triweekly service where I should like to see it made a daily service, and I know that when you make the expense of establishing a rural route so great and fix iron-clad and inflexible rules by which the Postmaster General can not establish one unless he establishes one at the maximum cost you are going to deny thousands of people the privilege of free delivery when they live 6, 8, 10, and 15 miles from post offices. I am in hearty accord with the view of the Senator from Florida. I have in mind the man who has to go 10 or 15 miles for his mail, and I should like to extend this service to his home.

Why, there have been rural routes discontinued in my State within the last year because the Postmaster General did not believe the number of families served would justify the expense of $1,100 or $1,200 to pay a carrier to deliver their mail. I have in mind now one that was discontinued within the last six weeks in the southwestern part of Kansas that served, I think, something over 30 families. It was the practice in the department for years that 60 families should be served by a route where the carrier received the maximum pay, or the route could not be established. It was afterwards reduced, I think, to 50, and then exceptions were gradually made until the number of families served was still less; and the present Postmaster General, in going over the routes that had been established, and in examining them, has found some that he believes are not justified by the number of people to be served, and they have been discontinued. Now, when you make the expense of maintaining the routes more the inevitable result is that more of them will be discontinued and that more of them will be reduced from a daily service to a triweekly or every-other-day service. That will follow, I do not care who is Postmaster General, if he takes into consideration the facts in the adjustment of this rural service. You can not say that he shall inaugurate any route, if it is not justified by the number of people served, at a cost of $1,200 or $1,300, or whatever it may be, to the Government. The Senate, instead of helping the rural service, instead of extending and improving the rural service by adopting this House provision and refusing to agree to the Senate amendment, in cutting it out, is taking action which will injure the rural service and have a tendency to reduce it from its present state and also to prevent its extension; and I do not believe that is in the public interest.

Where there is a dense population, where there are large quantities of mail to be delivered, the carrier is getting the full amount; but where there is a small amount of mail, he is getting not the additional $100, but a part of it, and that is what all this fuss is about.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. The estimate of the department, as I understand, was $54,700,000, was it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not remember the exact figures. The Senator doubtless has them.

Mr. GRONNA. And the amount recommended by the Senate committee is $52,000,000?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senate committee recommended whatever the Postmaster General thought would be necessary to maintain the service, and with the extensions that he thought would be desirable under the law as it now exists.

Mr. GRONNA. Was that due to the fact that it was considered better to take the difference of $2,700,000 out of the pay of the rural carriers rather than to appropriate it by Congress?

Mr. BRISTOW. How the Postmaster General arrived at that I do not know, but if the Senator from North Dakota wants to offer an amendment to the provision providing that the increase between the $52,000,000 and the fifty-four million and some hundred thousand dollars shall be used in extending the service where it does not now exist and leave the law as it is, I will join with him and vote for the appropriation. But I do not want to deprive those people of a service and give additional pay to the carriers in order to do so, because I do not believe that it is just. If I thought the Postmaster General was rendering an injustice to the carriers, if I did not think there was merit in the proposition that the volume of the mail handled and the weight of the mail that he is compelled to handle is an element which should be considered, then I would not be supporting the amendment of the committee to cut out the House provision.

Mr. GRONNA. I am quite sure the Senator from Kansas is always sincere in his belief; but the bill explains itself. The amendment reported by the Senate committee is that we shall appropriate $52,000,000. The estimate of the Post Office Department is $54,700,000. Evidently that difference could be used in extending the rural route service. There can be no question about that.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Florida will correct me if I am mistaken; but I do not think the $54,700,000 was the estimate of the department, except that it is the estimate of the department if the carriers are given the full advance, regardless of the weight of the mails they handle. Then it will require that much.

Mr. BRYAN. If section 21 remains in, it will require $54,700,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; and that does not provide for any more extension of the service than the $52,000,000 which is recommended by the Senate committee would provide for.

Mr. BRYAN. Not at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. If we appropriated the full amount of $54,700,000 and put a provision in the bill that the $2,700,000 shall go to the extension of the service, leaving the salary provision as it is, then you will extend a benefit to the rural people, because you will extend vastly the service that now exists and enable the Post Office Department to extend that service upon an equitable and just basis to carry and deliver the mail.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Kansas understand that the Postmaster General, whatever is done, has any intention of extending the Rural Delivery Service?

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course I do not know. I can not speak for the Postmaster General.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator knows that during the last year there has not been a single route established?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I do not know that during the last year none have been established. I think the Senator from Michigan means that none have been recently established. I want to be absolutely frank in this discussion and I am not going to be a partisan. For the first time in 20 years the revenues of the postal service are less than they were for the previous year. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, there will be a decrease in the amount of revenues collected through the Post Office Department, less this year than last year, and that has not happened in 20 years before.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Kansas permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. If the Senator from Kansas will yield, I should like, with the consent of the Senate, to bring up the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Kansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not a right to yield for that purpose, and I shall ask that there be an explanation of that report.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It will take but a minute. The chairman of the House committee has been over here urging that we take action upon it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to know what is in that conference report before it is adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The report was presented yesterday, and it has been printed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would rather it would not be taken up now and passed. I would rather not yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It has been printed and is before the Senate now.

Mr. BRISTOW. When it is taken up I want to ask some questions in regard to what it contains, and I will not have an opportunity to do it while I am speaking on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think it is fair for the Senator from Maryland to ask me to yield to allow a conference report to be adopted when I am interested in the provisions of that conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Then, I understand the Senator refuses to yield?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; I do. If the Senator insists on my refusing, I will refuse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am advised by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] that since June 30 there have been established 162 additional rural routes.

Mr. BRYAN. Between June 30 and December 1, 1914.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Postmaster General stated before the committee—I know I am not mistaken about that, because I asked the question, as I recall it; or, if not, some one asked it—that during the first two years he had established something like 1,500 routes, but since then he had not established a route.

Mr. BRYAN. He had not been Postmaster General for two years, and he was speaking of the time since he was Postmaster General. I read from a table printed in the House hearings, in which it is stated that the routes in operation June 30, 1914, were 43,652; routes in operation December 1, 1914, 43,814, which is an increase of 162 in those five months.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I was discussing the deficit in the postal revenues this year. Of course, we all have our views as to what caused that deficit. The Postmaster General feels that it is due very largely to the European war. I think that that has had some effect, but I myself think that other causes contributed to it very largely. But regardless of the cause the deficit exists. Whether or not it is a mistaken economic policy we will not discuss here; whether it depends upon the European war and its effect on the commerce of our country we will not discuss, because there would be a difference of opinion, and it would not be relevant to the question now under consideration. But the fact all must admit is that we are facing a deficit in the postal revenues.

I am not one who believes that the general public should be taxed to maintain a postal service. The Government of the United States has monopolized the postal business and handles it as a Government function. It did that because it thought it would be a wise policy, and it is the policy of governments as a rule. But the purpose is to render a distinct service to the citizen for a compensation which it receives for that service. It is not a function of the Government primarily. It is a function the Government assumed, because it is believed the Government can do it more equitably and more impartially than it could be done by any private company or any private individual or corporation, and in that I am in thorough accord. But there is no obligation on the part of the Government to render this particular service to the people at public expense. Fair and adequate compensation ought to be paid for service of this character which the Government renders.

So, if the postage collected is not sufficient, then there should be an increased rate of postage. If the postage collected is too much, then there should be a decreased rate. I believe that we should so adjust the rates and the expenditures that they would about balance. I do not believe in making it a source of revenue, but I do believe it should be self-sustaining, and I think that is sound and equitable.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not possible that the parcel post is the cause of a great loss in the revenues of the department?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the policy of the present Postmaster General in administering the parcel post is not wise. I have disagreed with him upon a number of his official acts in regard to the parcel post. While he claims that there is a surplus, I disagree with him and believe that there is a deficit coming from the parcel post, and I think he has made some great mistakes in the administration of that law.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from Kansas tell the Senate what the loss has been to the Treasury of the United States or to the Post Office Department in changing third-class matter to fourth class.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it has been very great. I can not state what the loss has been, because no man can state what it has been, but there has been a loss of several million dollars in the revenues of the department by that change.

Mr. GRONNA. Has there not possibly been a loss of at least $6,000,000?

Mr. BRISTOW. I would not make any statement as to the loss, because I do not believe it has, with any accuracy, been ascertained. I think there is a loss, without doubt, but still the very fact that the parcel post has been extended, that the Government is now carrying a great burden of catalogues, which it did not formerly carry, for the catalogue houses through the mails and delivering them to the rural communities, simply confirms the fact that the Postmaster General, in adjusting the compensation of the carriers, should take into consideration this added burden which falls unevenly upon the carriers, depending, of course, upon the density of the communities which they serve. The very fact that the parcel post has put into the mails very large volumes of merchandise and books and catalogues and tons of stuff that had to be delivered, when investigation showed that the burden resting upon some carriers for this additional service is much heavier than upon others, and where the distance traveled may be the same, makes it absolutely equitable and just that the Postmaster General should take into consideration this volume of mail in making an adjustment of the compensation.

He did not reduce the compensation of carriers, but all he did was to take the advance and apportion it, taking into consideration in the distribution of the advance the volume of the mail as well as the length of the route. You can not have absolute equity in this service, because the roads are very different. Complaints are made. I will say in passing that a carrier who has to travel a route that is 26, 27, 28, 29, or 30 miles ought to have more pay than a carrier whose route is 24 miles. It depends upon the circumstances. Take it over here in the hills of Virginia, where there are mud roads. At this season of the year 24 miles is all that any carrier can successfully handle. Take it in a section of New Jersey or Pennsylvania, where there are macadamized roads, or out West, where there is little rain and where the roads do not get muddy, as they do in other sections of the country, a carrier can make 30 miles, comparatively, with the same ease and during the same time that a carrier would make 24 miles in some other section of the country. So as to the added distance beyond the standard route of 24 miles it has been the policy of the department for years only to go beyond the 24 miles when the conditions of the road will justify it and not impose a burden upon the carrier who has to make it.

Some reference has been made here to the increase in the railway mail pay. Contrary to my judgment and against my vote, there was an increase of 5 per cent for the railways for the added weight due to the parcel post after the parcel-post law was adopted. The Postmaster General has followed the same policy in apportioning this 5 per cent that he has in apportioning the increase in the salaries of carriers. Where he has reason to believe or where he ascertains in his own way that the weight or volume of mail has not been increased 5 per cent he has not given the full 5 per cent. If, according to his investigation, he thinks it has been increased 2 per cent, he has added 2 per cent to the compensation, and if 3 per cent, he has added 3 per cent, and if 5 per cent, he has given the whole amount.

Now, I want to say this in closing: I think the compensation which the Government now pays the rural carriers is adequate. In some instances it may be small, in others it is excessive, depending upon the conditions which may obtain. I believe we ought to pay rural carriers or any other Government employees a just and liberal compensation. I am in favor of that and I am in favor of it now. But I also believe that in fixing the amount of public expenditure for any purpose we should take into consideration the public revenues and the means which we are compelled to resort to in order to obtain them. We find ourselves now, because of the condition of the public revenues, resorting to extraordinary taxes in order to maintain the public service. We have added or undertaken to add $100,000,000 by an extraordinary system of taxation. We have added an income-tax system to the sources of revenue which we formerly had. Yet with this additional revenue coming from the income tax and from these special taxes we are now confronted with a large deficit in the revenues of the Government.

In taking into consideration the revenues and the means we have to resort to to obtain them we should take into consideration the public expenditures. I believe that the present salary of a rural carrier is equal to or is larger than the great majority of such carriers would receive if they were employed in their private occupations in the communities where they live.

Whenever we increase the compensation we have to obtain the money with which to pay it by taxing those who are in private occupation, and when you impose a tax upon the man in the community who is working for $50 a month in order to increase the compensation of the man in the same community who is receiving $100 per month, you are imposing unjustly upon the man who is receiving $50 in the private occupation.

While it may not be popular with the Government employees who are asking for the increased pay to oppose increased pay, and while the citizen upon whose shoulders is placed the burden of furnishing the money to increase this salary may not realize it directly and feel that obligation to a public servant who serves in a legislative body like this for refusing to impose additional burdens on him for the benefit of his neighbor who is in Government service, yet under my duty as a Senator of the United States I feel that I am compelled to do it, and for one I am going to take into consideration in appropriation bills the man who has got to pay the money to sustain the Government of the United States.

It is an easy thing for us to pour out these millions into the public service when it appeals to our imagination or our desires. It is an easy and agreeable thing to pay and increase salaries of the hundreds and thousands of Federal employees, who have their paid representatives here sitting in the galleries to look down and to report to their organizations what every Senator is doing. But, nevertheless, if we do our duty, we have to take into consideration the men who are not organized and who pay the bills. That is what I propose to do. Sometimes I grow somewhat pessimistic when I observe the organizations which during recent years have been formed and maintained, who keep representatives in Washington to increase their own profits or pay whether they are in private business or in the public service.

It is only a short time in our history that the officers of the civil service of the United States have organized their association and employed their paid representatives and lobbyists and maintained them in the Capital for the purpose of increasing their compensations. But now there is not a year passes, there is not a session of Congress, when the corridors of this Capitol are not occupied by men who are paid by organizations of Federal employees to come here and try to induce Congress to tax the American people more than they are now being taxed for their special benefit. For one I do not propose to be unduly influenced by representations of that kind. I will receive their representations with respect. I am glad to listen to any complaints they may have; if I think they are just, I will vote to remedy them; but I will not forget that the majority of the people of the United States live to-day upon a compensation which is less than $60 a month, and that the great burden of the taxes that are paid to sustain this Government of ours comes from people who do not earn $750 a year. In my opinion we should take into consideration that element which deserves our consideration, because they have no one here to represent them as others have. Take the great farming population of the country. They do not keep lobbyists here to protect their interests. They are not so organized. We are discussing now a service in which they are vitally interested, a service which should be extended far beyond what it now is, a service that should be administered with the greatest economy in order that the Government may justly extend it beyond its present limits.

The amendment of the Senate committee to cut out the House provision simply gives the Postmaster General the power to extend that service without doing injustice to a single rural carrier or without reducing the pay of a single Federal employee, and we can do that in the face of the fact that we now have a deficit in the revenues, which we all deprecate.

So I earnestly trust that the amendment of the Senate committee disagreeing to the House provision as contained in section 21 will prevail.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up more than a few moments of the time of the Senate on this question. To me, from my observation, the question seems very simple and confined within narrow channels. Whatever deficiency has occurred or is occurring in the Postal Service, I imagine we are all agreed that it comes to a large extent from second-class matter and partially within recent times from the undue extension of the parcel post; that is, extending it to merchandise and commodities that never ought to be carried in the parcel post.

The real question here is in reference to the compensation of rural carriers. The question is whether we should take it out of them—deprive them of a little benefit that would inure to them to help make up this deficiency. From the time the service was established it was always the custom, until the present Postmaster General made a change, to base it upon the distance traveled by the rural carrier.

I have in mind concrete cases in my own neighborhood. I live in a town where we have eight rural mail routes. Two of them going out of town pass my own house where I live. I have watched those carriers. In our part of the country we have what you might call at least five months of hard winter weather—bad roads, snowdrifts, snowstorms, sometimes so bad you wonder that the carrier can ever venture on the road. The carrier in our part of the country can not use an automobile. Perhaps there are a few routes on which in summer he can use an automobile, but mostly he must have a light rig. The roads are so constituted that he can not drive with one horse. The tracks in the country are of such a character that you need a team. A rural carrier in our country must keep three horses. He keeps a team on the road steadily every day, and he has an extra horse to meet an emergency. So he has three horses to feed and take care of, and he gives his own time. He has so many miles to make a day. Whether his wagon is loaded with 100 pounds or 500 pounds makes no difference, he has to travel that number of miles; he has to keep that many horses; he has to be out on the road so many hours; he has to go through snowdrifts; he has to go on those country roads, rain or shine, regardless of the amount he carries. The mere fact that a carrier in one instance carries 300 pounds and another carrier in another instance only carries 100 pounds ought not to make a difference in their pay. The real expense to the carrier is in maintaining the team, feeding it, taking care of it, and taking care of himself. It is the time that is put in and not the mere pounds that he carries. Whether a carrier carries 50 pounds of mail on his route or carries 200 pounds, or whether he carries parcel post amounting to 100 pounds or carries parcel post amounting to 300 or 400 or 500 pounds, it is all the same to him; it does not make any difference. The only difference is that with the heavier load perhaps he may have to get out of his wagon a little oftener to deliver the packages than he otherwise would; but the same time, the same expense, the same horses, and the same weight are required in one instance as in the other. Now, why in those cases should you discriminate?

One carrier passes my house. He has a route of 24 miles. Another carrier has a route passing my house. He has a route of 26 miles. I have watched them when they came in at night. I have seen their little horses tired and worn out.

Now, in respect to those carriers, what difference does it make? Why should you discriminate because one wagon or one sled—they have to use sleds in winter—has a few pounds more than the other? That is not a criterion, and it is unjust to attempt to make up the deficiency that is arising in the Postal Service out of these poor carriers.

For that reason, Mr. President, without going into any extensive discussion of this matter, knowing as I do the hardships of our rural carriers in the northwestern country, knowing and seeing what they have to encounter, my heart goes out to them, and I do not think there ought to be anything done to cut down or diminish their salaries. While I am not here to criticize the Postmaster General, while I am not here to find fault with the administration of that department, yet I think in this respect an injustice which may be unintentional has been done to the rural carriers. If we want to make up the deficiency, let us change our law in relation to second-class mail matter and make that class of mail matter pay its just proportion of the expenses. Let us limit the extension of the parcel post so that it will not be compelled to carry sacks of flour or sacks of oats or sacks of salt or sacks of barley; let us not make our Parcel Post System the vehicle to carry merchandise; let us use it for what it was primarily intended, for carrying packages of a limited size, such as are ordinarily sent by express. If we do that, and if we make second-class mail matter pay its just proportion of postage in this country, if we limit our parcel post within proper bounds, we shall not only have no deficiency, but, Mr. President, I believe in time we may have 1-cent letter postage.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not know that I can add anything of value to what has already been said on this subject. However, I want to state my opinion regarding it.

The rural carriers in my section of the country are not adequately paid. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and other Senators have made so plain the investment which has to be made by such carriers that it is unnecessary for me to take up the time of the Senate to go into that matter any further; but I want to say with emphasis that the rural carrier in the western section of the country, in my State and in other States is not getting as much pay as he is entitled to get.

Only a few days ago, Mr. President, Senators from agricultural States refused to vote for an appropriation of $2,280,000 which provided for a census that, it might be said, was in the interests of the agricultural class. It has been intimated here this afternoon that we ask for this provision simply because we come from the agricultural portion of the country. So far as I am concerned, I am for the House provision, because I know it is only proposing to do justice to the carriers. I know that the people of my State are glad to pay them $1,200 a year, where the route is 24 miles long or more. The Postmaster General has never previously placed such a construction upon the law as he has placed upon it during the last year, not only against a carrier on a standard route or a route 24 miles in length, but holding that such carrier must carry 10,000 pieces of mail per month, and that he must carry weight to the amount of 1,300 pounds.

The Senator from Minnesota has just illustrated the difficulty that the rural carrier encounters in our section of country, at least during the winter months. During four or five long winter months he has to go through snowdrifts which are almost impassable. It is not fair to take $2,700,000 of the money which belongs to these carriers and to say that you are exercising economy and making up for the deficiency caused by the department making a classification which has produced that very deficiency of from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000, when less than 50 firms are benefited by that amount. No one but the mail-order houses of this country are receiving the benefit of that classification. No Senator who has been on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will deny my statement in this regard.

Mr. President, I only have the same interest in this legislation that every other Senator has. It is only a public duty that I feel I have to perform; but we should not say that these rural carriers are not patriotic because they demand fair pay. We have no right to say that the people in the West, where the country is sparsely settled, are not patriotic because they want mail service. The people of the country do not complain because in the Post Office Department there is a deficiency. If you are in favor of extending the rural mail service, increase the appropriation $10,000,000 more, and I shall vote for the proposition. To say that if we do not permit the Postmaster General to make an arbitrary ruling, an arbitrary classification, we must take $2,700,000 of these poor carriers' money in order to extend the service, to me is no argument. The Senate of the United States ought to provide for a sufficient amount of money not only to pay its carriers a fair compensation, but we ought to appropriate enough money to extend the service where the service is needed.

Mr. President, I do not care to delay the Senate any further. I am for the House provision. It is fair, it is honest, and it is just, not only to the carrier but to the people to whom this service is rendered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out section 21.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] because of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] on account of sickness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee proposing to strike out section 21.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Upon that, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out section 21 of the House bill.

Mr. HUGHES. That is the amendment in regard to the salaries of the rural mail-route carriers?

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understand, to strike that out will leave the provision as it came from the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is to strike out section 21.

Mr. TOWNSEND. By striking that out, we leave it as the House had it?

Mr. JAMES. No; if it is stricken out, it eliminates from the bill the language of the House text.

Mr. HUGHES. By refusing to accept the committee amendment the effect will be to retain the House text.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, by disagreeing to the Senate committee amendment we leave the House provision in the bill?

Mr. JAMES. That would leave the House provision in.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A vote in the negative is a vote to disagree to the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the question, as I understand, is on agreeing to the committee amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is it.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senate disagrees to the committee amendment, that leaves the House provision stand?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote "yea."

So the amendment reported by the committee was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the report of the committee of conference on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suggest that the Senator allow us to proceed with the pending bill. As I understand, in a few minutes we can get the bill out of the way.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 30, line 7, after the word "Service," to strike out "$54,700,000" and insert "$52,000,000," so as to read:

For pay of letters carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, $52,000,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, in order to make effective the vote of the Senate on the question just taken as to section 21 the committee amendment on page 30, just stated by the Secretary, should be disagreed to. I ask that the amendment be disagreed to on account of the action taken by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 30, striking out "$54,700,000" and inserting "$52,000,000."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, we have disagreed to the committee amendment to section 21, thereby retaining the House provision. An amendment should be made to that provision, in view of the fact that we have made this change, which will direct the Postmaster General to pay the portion of the salaries of rural carriers which has been withheld during the last year on account of his order construing the act of 1914. Therefore I propose as an amendment, at the end of the House provision, on page 57, at the close of the paragraph, the following proviso:

And provided further, That the basis and scale of compensation for rural letter carriers specified in this section shall be applied to the appropriation for pay of rural letter carriers for the fiscal year 1915.

I have already explained the amendment, and I think it will not require any further explanation. It is simply to carry out the intention of Congress from the time the appropriation became effective until the present time.

Mr. BRYAN. That would only increase the deficit $3,000,000 more.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand—but I should like to confirm my view about it by having the opinion of the Senator from Michigan—that this money was appropriated in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was.

Mr. PENROSE. And was available and was due to the rural carriers, so that this is simply to provide for their getting the compensation which Congress contemplated giving them. Am I correct?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I really am not going to argue against the proposition of the Senator from Michigan. It is rather a small matter; it only increases the deficit $3,000,000 more. If the Senate wants to do that, very well.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it would seem to me to be a very peculiar situation if now, after having interpreted the act of last year and having provided for enforcing its provisions, we should still allow these amounts to be held in the Treasury. It certainly would lay the Government open to a claim on the part of these men; and it seems to me we should carry out and make the legislation homogeneous and have it mean just exactly what we intended. I am willing to submit the matter on that proposition. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the text of the House bill it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That the basis and scale of compensation for rural letter carriers specified in this section shall be applied to the appropriation for pay of rural letter carriers for the fiscal year 1915.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, that means a further expenditure on this bill of $2,700,000. It means that during the present fiscal year we will pay $2,700,000 additional to rural mail carriers. The duty has already been performed. I do not think the Senate understands that not a single, solitary salary has been reduced by the department; but if the Senate wants to throw away $3,000,000 it can do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, while it is technically true that the money has not been taken away from them, they not having received it, it is true also that we appropriated this money for them last year. It is true that we have now adopted a proposition to pay them this amount for the coming year. During the last year the Postmaster General construed this act to mean that he could withhold a portion of their salary. They were entitled to that salary last year under the vote of the Senate at this time and by the vote of the House of Representatives.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I doubt very much the advisability of the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. This amendment has not been reported by any standing committee; it has not been estimated for; and I think I would rather take the chance of appealing to the rules of the Senate to protect the Treasury at this time than to the Senate itself. I raise the point of order that it has not been estimated for or reported by any standing committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I be heard for one or two minutes on the point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as I understand it, is simply to carry out the provision of the existing law, and therefore it is clearly in order.

Mr. BRYAN. No, Mr. President; the existing law says "not exceeding $1,200."

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Michigan can explain his own amendment more thoroughly than I can, as he is more familiar with this particular item; but, as I understand, it is simply to pay these men what the act of Congress—the last Post Office appropriation bill—directed should be paid.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Michigan will not contend, nor will anybody else, that the Postmaster General has violated any law or any act of Congress. He has exercised a discretion that Congress has left to him from the beginning, which provides that the salary on the standard route shall not exceed $1,200.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am not arguing the question as to whether the Postmaster General has exceeded his authority or not. I have a high respect for that gentleman; but in my opinion his action has resulted in completely negativing the act of Congress and the intention of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is not this the truth about it? His action followed the law. We probably meant to do something that we did not do.

Mr. PENROSE. I think that his action completely shatters the law and ignores the law, as if it never had been written into the statute books.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us understand where we are. Will this amendment increase the appropriation?

Mr. BRYAN. It will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will increase it $3,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has it been estimated for? [A pause.] The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22 on page 30. Yesterday I made the motion at a time when it was not in order; and I desire now to read and call attention to what took place before the House committee. This language is:

For experimental village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, $150,000.

They have experimented with a number, and pretty soon they will have experimented to the extent of one in each congressional district. As a matter of fact, there is no experiment about it. I suppose every man knows that a letter carrier can deliver mail in a village the same as he can in a town or a city. The department has never estimated it and has always opposed it. I desire to read exactly what occurred, if I may.

The Assistant Postmaster General says:

As soon as a petition from patrons is received it is investigated and the conditions relative to the equipment of the community in the way of sidewalks, streets, lights, etc., are ascertained. If it is shown that there are good grounds for its establishment, it is taken care of forthwith.

Mr. TUTTLE. You only provide for one in each congressional district until all of the congressional districts are taken care of?

Mr. BLAKSLEE. That is the policy; yes, sir. And I might say that I indicated in my report that its value to the Postal Service, either in increasing the revenues or in the adding of any tremendous improvement, is dubious. We have endeavored, however, to combine it with rural-delivery service, so that the rural carriers could be utilized in this service, and we have presented a recommendation for legislation that would permit us to pay rural carriers extra money for such service.

Mr. TUTTLE. In order to get this delivery service installed in a village a petition must come from the patrons of the office?

Mr. BLAKSLEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the policy to establish at least one village delivery service in each congressional district for experimental purposes?

Mr. BLAKSLEE. We endeavor to do so.

When you establish one in each congressional district the demand will come from every village in each district similarly situated for a village delivery service. It is not experimental at all. It is being built up in this way by having one established in each congressional district, and thereby inviting the insistence by every other village in that district that a village delivery service shall be given to it.

The Post Office Department has never asked for this money. A Congressman selects a town so as to put one in his district. When they get one in each district and the communities and villages all over the country begin to demand it, we are going to have a village delivery service, and the good old days of the people living in town going down to the post office to get their mail and to see the trains pass will have gone. Why, Mr. President, it would be more reasonable to have experimental service in the milking of the cows and the feeding of the horses. You could not keep the people in a village away from the post office if you tried to do it. There is no necessity for this legislation. It is simply a waste of $150,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not quite understand the question before the Senate. Do I understand the Senator from Florida to object to the $150,000 allowed by the committee?

Mr. BRYAN. I object to all of it.

Mr. PENROSE. To all of it?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know whether the Senator was abiding by the decision of the committee or not.

Mr. BRYAN. I am not. I do not know of any reason why I should. Nobody else does. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. There is another question I should like to ask the Senator. What is there in this provision, as contained in the House bill or as amended in the Senate, which requires putting this experimental service in every congressional district?

Mr. BRYAN. That is the plan. That is the understanding.

Mr. PENROSE. I never heard of this plan before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You were in the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. I am surprised that the Senator did not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This goes to Congressmen.

Mr. PENROSE. When the Senator is through I may have a very few remarks to make on the subject.

Mr. BRYAN. I am through.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question, Mr. President. If this service is extended to the extent he thinks it will be by having this special delivery in these small towns, what does the Senator think will be the ultimate cost to the Federal Government?

Mr. BRYAN. Why, I should say we ought to pay the carriers $1,200 a year apiece in the villages.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How much will that amount to, in the Senator's judgment?

Mr. BRYAN. I believe in 10 years it will be half the cost of the pay of the rural carriers.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And how much is that?

Mr. BRYAN. Fifty-four million seven hundred thousand dollars this year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the Senator thinks that this experiment, if it is extended, will ultimately cost the Government $27,000,000 a year?

Mr. BRYAN. There is no experiment about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I mean, if it is extended to what it is anticipated it might be?

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator knows the number of villages in this country, or he knows there are a great many, and the Senator knows that when one village gets it you can not resist the claim and the justice or the right of another village having it; and the Congressman who gets one in his district will invite the attempt of every other town and village to get one, and he will naturally advocate it; and how long will it take? It will come in a very few years.

I see the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] rising. Perhaps I ought to show what has been done in this bill. They have a village delivery service in Virginia in several places. In some places they have two carriers in towns of 1,200 people. They are paying them only $600 a year apiece. I understand there is an old soldiers' home, or something of the kind, that the junior Senator from Virginia wants to take care of. I believe there are 10 districts in Virginia. They all have one apiece.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BRYAN. This book says they have.

Mr. SWANSON. It gives the number of them there—four in Virginia, I think.

Mr. BRYAN. Perhaps I have the wrong place. I will find it.

Mr. SWANSON. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. BRYAN. Alabama has 3, Arizona has 1, Arkansas 5, California 1, Colorado 1, Connecticut 1, Florida 1, Georgia about 8. Some Congressmen have not been as active as others. New York, for example, has 5 and Virginia 10. Let us see about Michigan; that ought to be a good illustration. Michigan has 5.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many are there in Georgia?

Mr. BRYAN. Georgia has seven.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Florida has attacked this provision which simply continues a service where it now exists, and appropriates $150,000 for that purpose. There are certain small towns that in three or four years will have city delivery. Under the law you must have a certain amount of receipts before you have city delivery. Of all the communities that have less mail facilities and are more inconveniently situated in that respect than the people who live in the country, the most conspicuous cases are the cities that are on the verge of becoming entitled to city delivery. This has worked such a great hardship that Congress has made this small appropriation, but not for congressional districts. I do not know where the Senator got the idea that each congressional district would have one, except from people who are opposed to it.

Mr. BRYAN. I will read it to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. That is a charge that was made in the hearing, but there is no law fixing it.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator say that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General did not tell the truth about it?

Mr. SWANSON. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General antagonizes this appropriation, and in order to antagonize it they have said that ultimately every Congressman will get one. He will not get it unless the necessity exists in his district.

Now, look at the situation. Here are cities in Georgia, in Arkansas, in all the States, that in two or three or four years will be entitled, by population and by receipts, to city delivery.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then they will get it.

Mr. SWANSON. Pending that, they have less convenience, less facilities, less mail efficiency, than any class of people in the United States. You deliver the mail in the country, you deliver it in the cities, but this works a hardship in a great many small towns. They are not villages. They are named as villages, but what they mean by villages are cities that are not large enough to have city delivery and yet do not have rural delivery; and this is an amount appropriated to get rid of these hardships where that condition exists.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, why do you not put it in the shape of a general bill, and take care of all that occupy that status, instead of just singling out a few?

Mr. SWANSON. You do not single out a few. You leave it to the department to inaugurate the service where the need is most urgent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then you just pick some according to the ability to select and enforce it.

Mr. SWANSON. You pick cases where hardships exist. You pick cases where people are inconvenienced; and where you inconvenience the patrons of a post office you lessen the receipts of the office. You deliver the mail in Wall Street, in New York, and in other large cities seven or eight times a day. Why? It is not a special favoritism to them. It is because, when you do that, the people use the mails more, and it pays. Now, if the Senator from Georgia will point out cases in Georgia where hardships do not exist, where they ought not to have this delivery, and if he will go to the Post Office Department and say, "This is a waste of money," I am satisfied that they will withdraw it and give it to places where hardships do exist.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks it possible, in as large a State as Virginia or Georgia, to single out just seven post offices that have their conditions so peculiar that you could distinguish them on account of those conditions, and require that they should have the service, and not give it to others of the same size?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the applications from the different States, as I understand, are made to the department. I think the appropriation ought to be larger. I do not see why, in cities of three or four thousand, some of whose people live nearly 2 miles from the post office, the people who pay for the office and make the office profitable should have less mail facilities than people who live 20 miles from town. This is an appropriation to try to equalize these hardships pending the time when they will have city delivery. If you should strike out this appropriation and withdraw it in a great many of the places that now have this advantage it would be a hardship to deprive them of it. It has been divided among the different States, as I understand, fairly, and it is an appropriation that I think ought to be increased instead of being decreased. There is no intention to give it to every little village. The idea is to give it in the cities where you do not have rural delivery and you do not have city delivery, where a hardship is worked.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the question has been talked of around here about when a town is entitled to city delivery. My information is that when it reaches the third class it is entitled to city delivery, and this appropriation would be for fourth-class post offices; and the populations of the towns are given.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am opposed to this provision because it is not an experiment. That is simply a name. It contemplates picking out a few towns in each State and giving them city delivery.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to correct a statement made by the Senator from Florida. I believe that the law, or the rule of the department, if it is not a law, permits cities to have free delivery when they have a population of 5,000 and receipts from the post office of $10,000.

Mr. SWANSON. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Five thousand population and $10,000 receipts.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that is the rule.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that is it—$10,000 receipts.

Mr. BRYAN. I got my information from the clerk of the Post Office Committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. And they have to have suitable pavements as well.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say further to the Senator that in these cases before you are permitted to deliver mail to the city you have to number the houses, and the people have to go to an expense. It was intended that this appropriation should be applied where there were hardships before they had city delivery on account of the requirements.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, let us see what this provision is. Our general rule provides that where the population is 5,000 or more and the receipts $10,000 or more there shall be city delivery. That is the general rule. The proposition is to appropriate money for an alleged experiment in smaller cities. We have tried the experiment. It is no longer a matter of experiment. We know now. Do we wish to lower the size of the places that are to receive city delivery, and lower the amount of receipts as a basis of city delivery? If so, well and good; treat them all alike. If we wish to say that 4,000 population or 3,000 population or 2,500 population is sufficient for city delivery, let us say so. If we wish to say $5,000 receipts is sufficient, let us say so. Let us not simply take a few in each State and give them city delivery when there are many more of the same class that do not get it.

You can not pick out five or six or seven towns in a State the size of my State under any rule. You pick them arbitrarily. You pick them because somebody suggests them and wants them to have this service. Nobody can suggest a rule for a State the size of mine that would add simply seven more cities to the present law applicable to city delivery. I do not believe they could fix upon a principle that would simply include five more in the State of Virginia. Then how are the seven to be selected? How are the five to be selected? Those that Senators and Congressmen pick out of the lot for some purpose of special favor.

I do not believe in that kind of legislation. I am opposed to picking, as a matter of special privilege, certain cities or certain persons for favors. I believe they ought to be all treated alike. If the Senate is prepared, as I said, to reduce the size of cities to 4,000 before they are permitted to have city delivery, well and good. If it is prepared to reduce the amount to be received from the city in order to have city delivery, well and good. But let us take a uniform scale and give the city delivery alike to all cities that come up to the standard which we fix, and not proceed upon the theory of special favoritism.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator that I believe I was wrong in the statement I made a while ago about the population of cities required in order to get city delivery. I do not believe it is confined to cities of 5,000 people. I believe the rule, or the law—I do not know whether it is a law or a rule of the department, but I believe it is a law—requires the receipts to be $10,000. I do not believe there is any law in regard to population. I made the statement hurriedly, and I am inclined to think I was wrong in it. I know of cities that have city delivery that I am satisfied have considerably less than 5,000 population.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the rule is simply that they must have $10,000 receipts, then that is made the standard. What I am insisting on is that we have a standard, that we adopt what we consider a proper standard, and feed all the communities and all the States out of the same bowl and under the same plan.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will read from the Postal Regulations the cities that are entitled to City Delivery Service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. Section 665 of the Postal Regulations covers this matter, and is as follows:

> Letter carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter, as frequently as the public business may require, at every incorporated city, village, or borough containing a population of 50,000 within its corporate limits, and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than 10,000 within its corporate limits, according to the last general census, taken by authority of State or United States law, or at any post office which produced a gross revenue, for the preceding fiscal year, of not less than $10,000: Provided, This act shall not affect the existence of the free delivery in places where it is now established: And provided further, That in offices where the free delivery shall be established under the provisions of this act such free delivery shall not be abolished by reason of decrease below 10,000 in population or $10,000 in gross postal revenue, except in the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should be glad to extend the free delivery to cities just as rapidly as we can do it without a loss. I have presented my view completely when I urge the proposition that we should treat all alike.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not wish to take any considerable time in discussing this question; but I have been attracted by the statement which has just been made by the Senator from Georgia that this is not an experimental service. I think, in making that statement, he is in error. It was instituted two or three years ago because there was very considerable pressure from those living in villages for the installation of a similar service on the ground that every person living in the city under the conditions which obtained had his mail delivered at his door, that every person living in a rural section where there were a sufficient number on the route had his mail delivered at his door, and that there was no reason why a person living in a village a mile from a post office, for instance, should not have the mail delivered to him as in these other cases.

I am quite in sympathy with that contention. I agree that possibly this service can be carried on more economically than by having a distinct village delivery service. I think it ought to be connected with the rural carrier service. I think that if proper experiments are made along that line, many of these people who do live a considerable distance from their post office in a village, and very often do not have conveyances of their own, so that it is more difficult for them to get their mail than it is for the man who lives in the country who does have a conveyance of his own, could be connected up with the rural carrier routes so that the mail could be delivered to them. But we have had no report from the department that I am aware of as to the results obtained from this service, and we have not any recommendation about what should be done with it in the future obtained from the results of the service up to this time. I think, therefore, this appropriation should be continued for another year, with the understanding that the department shall report to Congress next winter some definite, concrete plan for connecting up this village service with the rural carrier service, thereby giving these people the service to which, I think, they are entitled without any very material increase in the expense.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. My attention has been called from the beginning to this special form of delivery service. The proposition was originally started in the House of Representatives by the Hon. WILLIAM W. GRIEST, a Representative in Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, and the first experiment was had in the town of Ephrata in Lancaster County, which constitutes his district; and since then he has consistently pressed the continuation of the experiment. The experiment was undertaken, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, in response to a real demand on the part of the public and on account of a real need. It is correctly described as an experiment in the bill and in the report of the Postmaster General. The Senator from Georgia may be entirely right in his contention that this service ought to be ultimately upon a more stable and well-defined basis, but evidently the time has not arrived when any such legislation can be secured.

The Postmaster General, in his report, states in regard to village delivery service as follows:

> In pursuance of a provision contained in the Postal Service appropriation act for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, experiments have been conducted—

He describes them as experiments—> in the free delivery of mail from post offices of the second and third class located in communities that are not now entitled by law to City Delivery Service. At the close of the fiscal year the service was in operation in 124 villages. Of these, 22 were offices of the second class and 102 were offices of the third class. A total of 164 carriers were employed, with an average annual compensation of $600.

The report of the Postmaster General then goes on to say that—

> There is no such need or demand for free delivery of mail in small towns and villages as there is in cities and rural districts, and its establishment does not occasion any appreciable increase in the use of the mails. For this reason an economical administration of such a service requires that it be inaugurated only where it is necessary to meet the needs of a particular locality.
> The department is endeavoring to work out a feasible plan to coordinate the village delivery with the Rural Delivery Service. As rural routes emanate from practically all of the communities where this village delivery service would be desired, it is believed the carriers should be used to make such deliveries as may be desirable and feasible to the residents of the communities affected. With this change these carriers could be used not only to supplement the general delivery service as indicated, but in many instances in the delivery of parcel-post matter as well, thus obviating the necessity for additional horse hire for the delivery of the larger packages.

It will be observed, therefore, Mr. President, that the Postmaster General distinctly describes this service as an experiment, not as a system to be inaugurated, and he distinctly states that it is to be tried only where the needs of a particular locality may seem to require or justify it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator now read, beginning at the bottom of page 323?

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will just permit me to finish what I was about to say in relation to this paragraph, I will be very glad to have him call my attention to that page.

Then the Postmaster General goes on to state how he thinks that ultimately he may be able to amalgamate it with the rural delivery service, which may be feasible or not feasible, I do not know; but he goes on to use this language, and I quote from the same page of his report:

> The use of the village delivery service has not extended far enough to determine definitely its practical and economic value to the entire service. Efforts will be made through the utilization of the rural delivery, as already stated, and otherwise to perfect and extend this service in proportion to the benefits to accrue therefrom.

I can not find anything in the recommendation of the Postmaster General adverse to this very small appropriation of $200,000 as fixed by the House, or $150,000 as reported by the Senate committee, to continue what, in my opinion, is a most beneficent and necessary experiment in the Postal Service.

I will be glad now if the Senator from Florida will repeat his inquiry.

Mr. BRYAN. The Postmaster General does not recommend the continuance of this experiment and the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in commenting on it——

Mr. PENROSE. On what page?

Mr. BRYAN. At the bottom of page 322.

Mr. PENROSE. I have it, Mr. President. This appears to be the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. He says:

> EXPERIMENTAL VILLAGE DELIVERY.
> The establishment of this service is authorized at villages and towns having post offices of the second and third classes that are not by law entitled to free-delivery service. The department requires that in towns where the service is instituted there shall be sidewalks, street lights, street signs, and house numbers, and that the patrons shall provide receptacles for the mail. Since the service was assigned to this bureau special attention has been given to the feasibility of utilizing the services of rural carriers to deliver mail to residents of villages, the regulations having been amended so as to permit such delivery. In many towns where the village service is established, rural carriers are rendering service in conjunction with the village carriers, and it is expected that in the smaller villages having post offices from which rural routes are operated, the rural carriers will be able to serve without assistance all patrons who desire to be accommodated. In order that extra compensation may be given to rural carriers in cases where such service adds considerably to their work it is desirable that authority be obtained for such payment out of the appropriation for village delivery service, the additional compensation not to exceed $150 per annum in any individual case. This improved method of administering the experimental delivery service would greatly decrease its cost.
> Reports received at the department, however, show that in most of the towns where the experimental service is operated the postal receipts have not been stimulated thereby and that, especially in villages where there are several mail trains daily, the patrons continue to call at the post offices for a large proportion of their mail. The average population of the towns where the service is established is less than 2,000, and the number of persons residing any considerable distance from the post offices in these towns is small. It would thus appear that the village delivery service does not constitute any great convenience for the patrons. Furthermore, the cost of operating the service is heavy when compared with the benefits derived.
> An inspection of this service has been directed at each office where it has been in operation for more than six months, and it is expected that by next December full information will be at hand which will be of great service to Congress in determining the advisability of continuing the experiment.

I can not find anything there against continuing this experiment.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me suggest to the Senator that this report was written in October, 1914; that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General said he would be ready to make a recommendation in December; and then this same gentleman goes before the House committee and says he does not want it.

Mr. PENROSE. I am only stating what he said then. I would be glad if the Senator from Florida would call my attention to the statement made before the House committee. I have the House hearings here, if he will give me the page.

Mr. BRYAN. On page 210.

Mr. PENROSE. I might state, in this connection, that the department in the Book of Estimates for 1916 estimated $200,000 for this item, which the House accepted.

Mr. BRYAN. On page 210 Mr. Blakslee says:

> And I might say that I indicated in my report that its value to the Postal Service, either in increasing the revenues or in the adding of any tremendous improvement, is dubious. We have endeavored, however, to combine it with the Rural Delivery Service—

And so forth. Then he states what the policy is—to give one in each congressional district.

Mr. PENROSE. I see nothing in the statement of Mr. Blakslee before the House committee which does not bear out what I have said. He says as follows:

That is the policy; yes, sir. And I might say that I indicated in my report that its value to the Postal Service, either in increasing the revenues or in the adding of any tremendous improvement, is dubious.

Why, every experiment is dubious, or it would not be an experiment. Let us keep on experimenting until it ceases to be dubious. He continues:

We have endeavored, however, to combine it with Rural Delivery Service, so that the rural carriers could be utilized in this service, and we have presented a recommendation for legislation that would permit us to pay rural carriers extra money for such service.

I can not find in the report of the Postmaster General or the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General any definite and specific adverse report on this service. The furthest they go is to say it is experimental, and that, in the opinion of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, it is dubious. I will concede for the sake of the argument that it is dubious, as all experiments are. That is no argument against this small sum of $150,000 in a bill carrying three hundred and twenty-odd million dollars, more or less, to continue an experiment which many people scattered throughout the country have greatly at heart and are greatly interested in.

Now, who the author is of the myth that it is contemplated to put one of these experimental deliveries in every congressional district has not yet developed in this discussion. Somebody said the Postmaster General or the Fourth Assistant had conjured up this ghost. I find no statement of theirs making any such allegation. The statement is made that after this monstrous outrage is perpetrated of giving free delivery in at least one village of every congressional district of the country, we will have saddled on the annual appropriation bill an item of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 or more. I can not find any foundation for that assertion in any record of the House hearings or in the reports of the department. The proposition has gone no further than the experimental stage, as I understand it.

I have here, Mr. President, a statement of the village delivery service in operation December 1, 1914, which I will ask permission to have inserted as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. The question was asked of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General:

How are these villages selected for the installation of free-delivery service?

And he replied:

This appropriation was transferred to our supervision by the First Assistant Postmater General in April last, and the policy of the department in connection therewith was to establish one village delivery service in each congressional district in the country if possible.

Now, I have found the author of the first congressional district proposition. I had not seen it before. It exists in the imagination of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. But he goes on to say:

As soon as a petition from patrons is received it is investigated, and the conditions relative to the equipment of the community in the way of sidewalks, streets, lights, etc., are ascertained. If it is shown that there are good grounds for its establishment, it is taken care of forthwith.

There is nothing in the act of Congress or in the report of the Postmaster General to indicate this proposition is more than an experiment. That it is to be extended into every congressional district seems to exist only in the imagination of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and that would clearly be dependent upon whether the experiment is a success or not.

If it is a success, Mr. President, why should not the Government go on with it? I do not know whether the Senator from Florida has any idea of the number of people who would be benifited by this free delivery, but the statement has been made that not less than 15,000,000 people are directly concerned in the success and permanence of town and village mail delivery. That is quite a number of people to be considered when it comes to extending the facilities and the conveniences of the Postal Service. That is a considerable number of people to be discriminated against when the inhabitants of cities and the inhabitants on farms have the mails delivered at their doors and at their gates.

It is all the more important that this paragraph be left in unless the service is abolished entirely, because, as I understand it, the Senate has agreed to the committee amendment striking out the provision in section 22 which empowered the Postmaster General—to pay an additional compensation to rural carriers, out of the appropriation for village delivery service, a sum not to exceed $150 per annum in any individual case for delivering mail at second and third class post offices not now by law entitled to free-delivery service.

That having been stricken from the bill, as far as the Senate is concerned, should the House concur in the amendment, this very interesting experiment, so potential for good to the villages which enjoy these privileges and of so much possibility for 15,000,000 people inhabiting them throughout the country, will absolutely be wiped out of the bill by this Congress, giving no relief even in the way of continuing the experiment through the Rural Delivery Service.

I do not think, Mr. President, that I ought to detain the Senate much longer on this matter.

Mr. GRIEST, the author of this legislation in the House, took occasion to communicate with a large number of Representatives who had this experimental service started in their districts, and the testimonials in favor of the service are remarkably unanimous and highly favorable to this form of delivery. They are taken from Representatives regardless of party, and they furnish a striking comment in favor of this experimental delivery from Ephrata, in Pennsylvania, to Willits, in California—from the district of Mr. WILLIAM W. GRIEST to the district of Mr. WILLIAM KENT in the State of California.

I hope that the Senate will not start to economize in this bill by striking out this small sum of $150,000.

I ask permission to insert certain matter in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Class of towns which should be made eligible to receive a permanent mail-carrier service—Continued.

[Appendix to remarks of Hon. WILLIAM W. GRIEST on the bill (H. R. 11338) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.]

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, supplementary to my remarks on town and village mail delivery, delivered in the House January 16, 1914, I desire to present additional testimonials which have been received by courtesy of and through Members of the House in commendation and indorsement of the experimental mail delivery now in operation in the districts of these Members. These letters, taken in connection with those previously presented, show that the experimental mail-delivery system is a pronounced success, and they refute the information received by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who on the day of the adoption of the paragraph in the Post Office appropriation bill relating to town and village mail delivery is reported in the RECORD as saying:

"Representatives in the House who live in such communities have informed me that they know this service is of no special benefit."

Among the 114 Members who have this service in their districts I have been unable to discover a single one who does not commend it and demand its retention by the Government. The letters now presented for publication, and those heretofore published, indicate a unanimous desire on the part of "Representatives who live in such communities" for the permanent establishment of a service which, it is now demonstrated, is regarded as indispensable and to the benefits of which from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 are of right entitled.

Hon. Sereno E. Payne, representing Dundee, N. Y., writes:

"I certainly think this service should be extended to villages of the same class where a single carrier can do the work and larger ones where two carriers can do it."

Congressman Payne also furnishes a letter from Mr. E. Vreeland, of Dundee, who says:

"The people appreciate the service and desire to have it continued and improved. The residences should be ordered numbered and collection boxes erected. Should the service be taken away a vigorous protest will result. With the constant increase of postal business, especially the growth of parcel post, it is almost imperative that a way be provided for the quick disposition of mail matter. Otherwise larger quarters and additional help will be needed to properly conduct the business even in a third-class office."

Hon. H. H. SELDOMRIDGE, representing Littleton, Colo., writes:

"I have just received a letter from the postmaster at Littleton, Colo., which substantially confirms the report made by the postmaster at Ephrata, Pa. The postmaster states that the service has been satisfactory in every way. The carrier there is handling over 18,000 pieces of mail each month. The service has grown to the extent that over 780 patrons are being served. There has been full and complete cooperation between the people and the postmaster, and a discontinuance of the service would be greatly deplored."

Hon. SAM R. SELLS, representing Elizabethton, Tenn., writes:

"I have been to Elizabethton a few days ago and find that the statements of the postmaster with reference to this service are correct. The patrons of the office are very much in favor of the continuance of this delivery, and I trust that arrangements to that effect may be provided for in the annual Post Office appropriation bill."

Congressman SELLS also submits a letter from Mr. E. E. Hathoway, who says:

"The patrons are well pleased with the village free delivery that we have at this office and ask that you use your influence to make it permanent. I believe that it has increased the receipts of this office. I have had a number of the patrons who are served by this delivery to ask that you do what you can to make it permanent, that it saves them time running to the office for the mail, and the business men are more than delighted with it. I hope you will do all you can for us."

Hon. THOMAS L. RUBEY, representing Lebanon, Mo., transmits a letter from F. J. Swett, who says:

"In reply, permit me to say that my experience with the establishment of five rural routes justifies me to believe that the attempt to deliver mail in towns of this size, in view of the time established, is an absolute success. In other words, if this service is made permanent, in a few years there will be no demand at the general-delivery window except by transients. My conclusion regarding the delivery of mail in Lebanon is as follows: The certainty of receiving and collecting mail at regular hours will have a most beneficial effect upon the patrons of the office in saving them time and systematizing their mail, and without additional expense to the service."

Hon. JAMES A. HUGHES, representing Princeton, W. Va., writes:

"I want to say that the postmaster, the city council, and all of the business interests at Princeton are enthusiastically in favor of this service, and, in fact, this service now has become a necessity. This particular town is strung out about 3 miles in length."

Congressman HUGHES submits a latter from Mr. Wirt A. French and a resolution signed by Mayor J. D. Scott as adopted by the City Council of Princeton.

Mr. French writes:

"We have between 6,000 and 7,000 inhabitants within our corporate limits at this time, and I should say that the post office serves at least 7,500 people in and out side of the corporate limits. I beg to report further that the delivery system in use in our city has been of the greatest benefit to all our citizens, and we feel that if anything should occur to deprive us of same that it would indeed be the worst calamity that could possibly befall us."

The resolution reads:

"Whereas it appears that our present city delivery of mails is only temporary and dependent upon the Congress of the United States for an appropriation for its continuance; and

"Whereas that city delivery has been in use in our city for about 11 months, and has proven so entirely satisfactory that our business concerns and residents have become dependent upon same to such an extent that to discontinue same would, in our opinion, be nothing short of a calamity, and would result in irreparable injury to the best interests of our city and the whole citizenship of same * * *.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of our city, and that the recorder be requested to furnish two copies of same to Wirt A. French, postmaster of our city, with the request that he forward same to our Senators and Members of Congress."

Hon. BURTON L. FRENCH, representing St. Maries, Idaho, advises:

"I would say that as far as the experiment has gone I am advised that it has proven a decided success. The experiment has been seriously handicapped on account of the fact that the service has been allowed but one carrier, and he has not been provided with equipment such as mail bags, etc., that would have best served him as carrier. There has been no provision made for street letter boxes, and as a result of this many people have had to go to the St. Maries post office to mail their letters who had no other reason for making the trip. The postmaster at St. Maries, Mr. Edgar T. Hawley, advises me that it is his judgment that the delivery system that has been tried experimentally at St. Maries would be a decided success in such post offices if a sufficient number of carriers with equipment could be provided and letter boxes for the collection of mail placed at suitable points. He advises that he believes that the public at St. Maries have been profited far beyond the cost of maintaining the system there, and that the general idea is a good one."

Hon. E. A. Merritt, jr., representing Norwood, N. Y., writes:

"For the past two years the village of Norwood, N. Y., in the congressional district which I represent, has been designated as one of those for experimental test of mail-delivery service in towns and villages not eligible under the present law to receive city delivery service. The service in Norwood has proven highly satisfactory to the patrons of the office, has been of great assistance to the business men of the town, and I am informed that the postal receipts since its inauguration have increased. I therefore am most heartily in favor of that item in the Post Office appropriation bill appropriating $200,000 for continuation of this service, and also would favor any plan providing for the proper extension of this service so that all villages where it would be beneficial might be included. Therefore any assistance that I can render to that end I shall be most pleased to do."

Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES, representing Blackville, S. C., sends a letter from Mr. B. J. Hammet, who reports:

"It affords me pleasure to state that the patrons of this office are much pleased and delighted with the city delivery service."

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR, representing Durand, Wis., incloses letters from Messrs. August Ender and H. A. Miles, who say that the mail-carrier service "is highly satisfactory to the patrons."

Mr. Ender writes:

"In regard to your interesting inquiry, will say the city delivery is working wonders here, and our people could hardly get along without it. The revenues of the local post office have increased, and there is such a friendly feeling that we have used our paper to urge people to be still better patrons of Uncle Sam."

Mr. R. P. Wilton, chief burgess of Wrightsville, Pa., writes:

"Learning of the contemplated plan of the Post Office Department to discontinue the free mail-delivery service established in 114 towns and villages throughout the United States, and realizing that the discontinuance of this service would seriously affect the welfare of the town, I called a special mass meeting of citizens to protest the action of the department and to petition Congress. This mass meeting was held Tuesday evening, January 20, and the inclosed sworn copy of resolution will convey, in a measure, the sentiment of the town. Surely, a resolution signed enthusiastically by more than 700 citizens must carry great weight."

The resolution, signed by 751 citizens of Wrightsville, reads:

"Realizing that the discontinuance of free mail-delivery service established in Wrightsville, Pa., in February, 1913, would interfere seriously with the growth and welfare of the borough, and to express our appreciation of this service as now enjoyed and found necessary, it is

"Resolved, That we, the citizens of Wrightsville, Pa., in special mass meeting assembled, do petition Congress and the Post Office Department to take such action that will insure a continuance of this very valuable and appreciated service."

Hon. R. W. AUSTIN, representing Lenoir City, Tenn., presents the following from S. F. Carroll:

"The village delivery service for Lenoir City has proven entirely satisfactory in every respect and has been well received and patronized. The receipts of the office has increased over last year."

Hon. FRANK PLUMLEY, representing Ludlow, Vt., after careful inquiry, writes:

"Extending my answer of the 7th instant to yours of the 29th ultimo, wherein you sought information concerning the operation of the experiment of mail delivery service in towns and villages, in the town or village of Ludlow, Vt., being one of those experimental tests made by the Post Office Department, I am now prepared to say to you that careful inquiry disclosed the fact that beginning with July 4,483 pieces were delivered; August, 7,186; September, 8,310; October, 10,536; November, 9,919; December, 13,600, being a progressive and rapidly increasing use of the facility offered, and constituting a total for the six months ending December 31 of 54,034 pieces. This service was all rendered by one man, except on Christmas week, when a clerk was furnished and a team to help out a carrier, and with this assistance everything was kept cleared up each day. Collections were made by the carrier, as patrons handed him their mail as he passed by.

"It being known that I was making some inquiry to get information concerning the operation of this method of helping out in their village, and a rumor having started that there was danger that the village would lose the privilege they had through it, voluntary letters have come to me from merchants and business men and citizens expressing strong commendation of the service, saying that many of the merchants patronized it; that it is the greatest benefit to ladies and people living a long distance from the office; that the village is served by a very efficient carrier, and everybody would hate very much to give up their great accommodation, and further saying that if Congress wants to take the free delivery away the people in Ludlow must enter a protest. Another asks me most earnestly to support the retention of the free-delivery proposition for Ludlow and other places like it; it is said by this person that 'the experiment here is proving a great convenience and is appreciated by all our people. We hope you will see your way clear to indorse the privilege recently granted.' Another says: 'I certainly hope that the appropriation bill for letter carriers in towns like Ludlow will be carried through. I certainly have enjoyed having my mail and parcel post delivered. It would be a great disappointment to me to have our carrier discontinued. It saves time and is so convenient. I am sure this is the case with everyone in town. Any part you may take in favor of continuing our carrier will be appreciated by me and everyone in town.' Another says: 'I find upon investigation that a goodly number are taking advantage of the arrangement. I feel that there will be much inconvenience felt by a goodly number should the present arrangement be discontinued. One of the rural free delivery carriers stated that if the increase in the use continued it would not be long before a second carrier would be needed.'

"I will say, further, that the other information which I have from Ludlow is along the same line, and substantiates fully the quotations which I have made, and having a deep interest in every step which brings to the people their mail most readily and efficiently, and which tends, as I believe, to the development and betterment of the conditions in our towns and villages of modern size, I heartily favor the continuance and extension of village mail delivery.

"If there is anything which I can do to aid you in your appreciated efforts along this line, I offer my services."

Hon. WILLIAM KENT, representing Willits, Cal., submits a letter from Mr. Charles Whiteel, who writes as follows:

"Relating to experimental city delivery, would state that it is giving good satisfaction, and if it is not made permanent it will be a great disappointment to the patrons of the delivery. It has increased the receipts and made the service more thorough."

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, representing Wynnewood, Okla., transmits an interesting letter from Mr. H. S. Shackelford and a largely signed petition from patrons of Wynnewood, which reads:

"We, the citizens of Wynnewood, Okla., patrons of the Wynnewood post office, now being served as such through the experimental village free delivery, respectfully petition your honor to work for and aid in securing the continuation of same for this as well as other villages and towns of like size. We are decidedly in favor of this branch of the service, because it enables us to enjoy the same privilege that our rural neighbor enjoys, as well as our neighbors living in a city where the receipts of the office are such that they are permitted to have regular free-delivery service because of said regulations.

"The service in this town has been very efficient and has proven beyond a doubt that the Post Office Department has made no mistake in establishing said service, and we are loath to give up this highly appreciated service."

Mr. E. E. Norvell, of Wynnewood, Okla., also writes as follows:

"This service has been in operation in this city since March 1, 1913, and recently a petition was circulated for its continuation, and only one man in the whole city refused to sign the petition, yet his wife was very enthusiastic in asking for the continuation of the service.

"This service fills a long-felt want by the women and children of these towns and cities, which enables them to get the daily papers, instead of them being carried to the business houses and thrown down, and perhaps never carried to the residences by their husbands and fathers, thereby depriving them of the educational advantages they would get by the reading of the daily newspapers.

"The women and children of our city are the loudest in their praises of the service they are getting through this branch of the service. We have a population of 2,800, and practically the entire town is being served by the village carrier and the two R. F. D. carriers out of this office. We have been unable to ascertain whether the collection of mail has been greater than would have been mailed at the post office or not because the department has failed to furnish mail boxes for the streets.

"I shall soon retire from the service as postmaster of this city, but I am very enthusiastic in my support of the village delivery service for small towns. I also take a pride in the fact that my office was the second in the State of Oklahoma to have this service established."

I also present a letter from Hon. Daniel C. Roper, First Assistant Postmaster General, who has kindly submitted data as to the number of different towns represented by applications, petitions, and inquiries filed in the Post Office Department concerning the establishment of town or village mail-delivery service.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,

Hon. W. W. GRIEST,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GRIEST: Referring to your letters of December 22, 1913, and January 19, 1914, I take pleasure in inclosing the data relative to experimental mail delivery service you request, showing by States the number of applications received for the institution of the service on which no action has been taken, and the number of inquiries received on the subject of delivery at the different towns.

I very much regret that through a misunderstanding this data was not furnished you more promptly.

Yours, very truly,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word before the vote is taken upon this amendment.

It seems that the revenues of the Post Office Department, as estimated for the coming year, would be from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 short of the expenditures. If there ever was a time, it is important now that we should at least curb those appropriations which indicate that in the future will produce great expenditure. The Senator from Florida has stated that, in his judgment, if the experiment is extended from free-delivery village, as now named, to the thousands of the same size in the United States, that it would ultimately make an expenditure of probably $20,000,000 a year.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that in these times we should not make these expenditures. It is not of any great benefit. Everyone knows that in villages less than 2,000, and that is the size which the Postmaster General has said is the limit upon which any delivery of this kind has been established, that the people desire to go to the post office for their mail. It is not any great inconvenience for them to go, because the distance is only a few blocks. Considering the enormous expense it is likely to develop, and the fact that it is not any great convenience to the people, and that we have a deficit in the treasury of the Postal Service, it seems to me that we ought to vote in favor of striking out this appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask the Senator from Colorado if it would not be well to commence economy on the extension of the parcel post?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is mighty hard to tell——

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me to finish my statement, I desire to say that the Senator knows that the department has lost large sums of money this year on account of the classification that has been made; and only such people as Sears, Roebuck & Co., Montgomery Ward, and other catalogue houses have profited by it. It is only recently that Sears, Roebuck & Co. declared a dividend of more than $20,000,000. Why not commence economy there, instead of cutting down on these little items which give the people of this country valuable and needed service?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will suggest to the Senator that men will differ as to which item of an appropriation bill is the more important. I am satisfied that the parcel post has produced a great reduction in express rates for the people, though maybe that is a service that ought to be curtailed somewhat; but here we are branching out into a new experiment, which it is supposed will in time develop into an enormous expenditure. The Senator from Florida has estimated it at $20,000,000. To start that now at a time when we will have a deficit in the postal receipts seems to me to be very wrong.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that it is desirable to limit expenses, this year especially, so far as possible, but the Senator himself has just voted for a proposition that added $2,700,000 to the bill as reported by the committee, and now he wants to save $150,000 in some other way. Why did he not vote to save the $2,700,000?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, 62 Senators voted in favor of that appropriation and only 10 voted against it. That is pretty good evidence of the fact that it was a needed appropriation; but that was a different proposition from establishing and extending a new branch of the service that will involve large expenditures in the future. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the amendment of the Senator from Florida ought to be agreed to and that the provision in the bill ought to be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Nelson	Shields
Bankhead	Gore	Norris	Simmons
Brandegee	Gronna	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Hardwick	Page	Sterling
Bryan	James	Penrose	Swanson
Burleigh	Johnson	Perkins	Thomas
Camden	Jones	Pittman	Thompson
Catron	Kern	Poindexter	Townsend
Chamberlain	Lane	Pomerene	Walsh
Chilton	Lewis	Ransdell	Weeks
Clapp	Lippitt	Robinson	White
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Root	Williams
Culberson	McCumber	Saulsbury
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth
Fletcher	Myers	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, just a word in reference to this amendment. If I understand correctly, the Senator from Florida has moved to strike out the provision for experimental village delivery. I have not listened to all that has been said on the subject, but I wish to submit this thought, which comes to me from practical experience in matters of this kind. This delivery service is only provided in sizeable towns, not small towns but good-sized towns, which are a little too small for ordinary city delivery. I know of many cases where on the outside of the line between a corporate village and the country are families who are served with free rural delivery, while on the inside of the line the patrons have to go to the post office for their mail. That is a hard matter to explain, and it is almost impossible to satisfy those people.

It has occurred to me that the people on the inside, or the village side of the line, are quite as much entitled to delivery as those who live just across the road. That point is emphasized over and over again in all of the cases where we have this delivery; and therefore it seems to me that, until this experiment shall determine the feasibility of the project, we can afford to continue it, having started upon it and not having appropriated any larger amount, until we are satisfied that it is either good or bad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PENROSE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as on the last vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], but I understand if he were present he would vote as I have voted, and so I will let my vote stand.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a pair with that Senator, but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness in his family, and to state that he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bristow	Hardwick	Poindexter	Stone
Bryan	Jones	Ransdell	Thomas
Burton	Kern	Robinson	Thompson
Camden	Martine, N. J.	Root	Walsh
Catron	Myers	Shafroth	White
Clapp	Nelson	Sheppard
Fletcher	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Gore	Overman	Smoot

NAYS—36.

Ashurst	Gronna	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	James	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Burleigh	Johnson	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	La Follette	Penrose	Swanson
Chilton	Lane	Perkins	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Pomerene	Vardaman
Culberson	Lodge	Saulsbury	Warren
Dillingham	McCumber	Simmons	Weeks
Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

NOT VOTING—31.

Bankhead	Fall	Lewis	Shively
Borah	Goff	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Clarke, Ark.	Hollis	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Hughes	Pittman	Thornton
Crawford	Kenyon	Reed	Tillman
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Sherman	Works
du Pont	Lee, Md.	Shields

So Mr. BRYAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I judge from the length of debate over this item of $150,000 for village delivery and from the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that there is a $20,000,000 deficit in the department, that the committee would not object to any suggestion that would curtail the expenses of the department without interfering with its efficiency. I want to submit an amendment in a moment, and I hope that, in view of the situation of the department as to its revenues, there will not be any point of order made against it by the committee, and that it will at least not be opposed by the committee. The amendment is to take the first-class and second-class post offices out of the control of politics and to put them on a business basis.

This is not a new matter by any means. I do not claim any virtue of discovery or originality in suggesting it. It is a matter that has been very carefully investigated by Government commissions, and I want to read in a moment short extracts from several messages of the President of the United States in a former administration, urging the adoption of this change in the official arrangement for the conduct of the first and second class post offices.

The first and second class post offices are not, or at least ought not to be, political institutions. They are business institutions, the purpose being to receive the mail which comes into the post office, to distribute it, to sell the stamps and money orders, to receive the revenues, and to make the proper accounting for them. It is perfectly obvious, it does not need any argument to convince any reasonable man, that so far as the purposes of these offices are concerned the same economy and the same business efficiency ought to be applied that is applied in any private concern. There can be no object whatever in allowing the desire of a political party to prevail in the country to turn these offices over as the muniments of war of political campaigns.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I address an inquiry to the Senator?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator certainly does not mean to insinuate that that has been the practice under the present administration. Does he?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I do not make any insinuation.

Mr. PENROSE. I am very much gratified to know that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator has been here and has observed the amount of time the Senate has spent in discussing the wholesale change of first and second class postmasters, he realizes that I would not make any such insinuation. These changes have been based altogether upon the political partisanship of the man receiving the appointment, having nothing whatever to do with their efficiency in the Government business. It is corrupting in its influence and embarrassing to the proper independence of the Senate.

Mr. President, even if there were no saving in the cost of operation, the office ought to be run solely for the purposes of the Post Office Department; but when it costs more to the extent of at least $6,000,000 a year to put them under political control, there is an additional reason why politics ought to be eliminated from it.

In practically every first and second class post office there is both a postmaster and an assistant postmaster.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington what his proposed amendment is?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will read it to the Senator. I was just going to state the substance of it, in the first place. The substance, before reading the amendment, is to consolidate the two offices of postmaster and assistant postmaster in first and second class offices, and to change the name of the assistant postmaster to superintendent, and put it in the classified civil service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to have the Senator read the amendment to the Senate, so that I can understand it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I propose to add, at the close of the bill, this——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is about to read what he now offers?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; what I will offer in a moment.

The offices of postmaster and assistant postmaster are hereby abolished in first and second class offices, and in lieu thereof is created the office of superintendent of post office. Each post office of the first and second classes shall be in charge of a superintendent, to be appointed by the Postmaster General. In each such office where there is an assistant postmaster such assistant postmaster shall be appointed to the office of superintendent of post office, if qualified therefor, and shall hold the same subject to the laws and regulations of the classified civil service. Thereafter all appointments to the office of superintendent of post office shall be made upon merit, and where practicable by promotion or transfer from the employees of the Postal Service, and shall hold the office without regard to politics or political recommendations, upon the terms and conditions and subject to such tenure as is provided by the laws and regulations governing the classified permanent civil service. For compensation to such superintendents of post offices there is hereby appropriated $3,613,279. This section shall not apply to postmasters or assistant postmasters now in office whose terms have not expired, but they shall be allowed to serve out the term for which they were appointed. All acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington pardon some inquiries?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. It is needless, of course, for me to say that I am in hearty sympathy with the spirit of the proposed amendment, but it seems to me to leave the matter incomplete in some respects.

First, it makes no provision for the salaries of these superintendents.

Second, wherever there is to-day a postmaster and an assistant postmaster, theoretically at least the services of the two are required, and dispensing with the one, as this amendment would do, would leave the offices short one assistant or one man who would ordinarily take the place of the assistant. It seems to me that the amendment ought to cover those two points.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Senator from Kansas to pardon me just a moment. I am very glad that the Senator from Minnesota made his inquiry. He is mistaken, however, as to the amendment not providing for the salary of these superintendents.

Mr. CLAPP. There is a gross appropriation; but the Senator does not say, in the amendment, what the salary of the superintendent at a given point would be. It does not even continue in force the rate of salary which either the assistant or the postmaster at present is receiving. It is true that the amendment makes an appropriation of some $3,000,000 for salaries.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would leave it, until corresponding changes are made in the classified service, in the discretion of the Postmaster General to fix the salary of these superintendents, which as a matter of probability would be based upon the present salary of the assistant postmaster.

Mr. CLAPP. If this amendment were adopted, and the term of office of the postmaster in some given post office should expire, the assistant then would become, if qualified, under this amendment, the superintendent. In the absence of any express provision, would the Postmaster General have any authority to fix the compensation of that superintendent? It does not seem to me that he would. If he has, then that point is covered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think he would have authority to fix the salary, but if not that is a detail which could be very easily taken care of. It has been estimated by those who have given some attention to the subject that the additional responsibilities and services that would be required of those employees who are now assistant postmasters, in case they took charge of the office and performed the duties that are now performed by the postmaster and the assistant postmaster, would be reasonably compensated by an increase of approximately 20 per cent in the salaries which they now receive.

Mr. CLAPP. That is merely an estimate; but the question is, Does the authority exist? If it does not exist, it seems to me that if this amendment is to be adopted at this time the authority ought to be conferred or some rule given for fixing the salary.

The other point is this: Take a position where to-day there is a postmaster and an assistant postmaster. Under this amendment, if it is adopted, the postmaster will go out at the end of his term and the assistant will be advanced to the office of superintendent. Now, is there any authority anywhere to-day in the law—I am making the inquiry because I am not familiar with the facts—under which the additional help could be appointed, designated, and employed that would be rendered necessary by eliminating one of these officials?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; the Postmaster General has authority to allow additional employees in offices. My opinion is that there probably would be very little need for additional help.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. The last remark of the Senator is just what I wanted to call his attention to. In my opinion you could drop out of existence, according to the provisions of this amendment, every postmaster in the United States, leaving the assistant postmaster and the superintendent at their present salaries; and, so far as the effectiveness and the efficiency of the service is concerned, the people would never know anything about it.

Mr. CLAPP. In the main that is probably true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator as to that, but still there would be a saving of many millions of dollars even if we increased to some extent the salaries of the present assistant postmasters, say, to the extent of 20 per cent. At the present time the salaries of postmasters in first-class offices amount in the aggregate to $1,731,800, and of the postmasters in second-class offices to $4,682,500, being a total of $6,414,300 as the salaries of the postmasters of first and second class offices. All of that would be saved, because the office of postmaster would be abolished. The salaries of assistant postmasters in first-class offices aggregate $846,600, and those of assistant postmasters in second-class offices $2,164,466, or a total of $3,011,066. If the salaries of the assistant postmasters be raised 20 per cent on account of the increased responsibility of having charge of the office, that would amount to $602,213; and if that amount is deducted from the total salaries of the postmasters at the present time it will give a result of $5,812,087, which would be directly saved by this change; but it is estimated that the indirect saving in the increased efficiency of the office by having it in charge of competent superintendents, who are chosen for merit and for experience, would be as great as the direct saving.

I referred a moment ago to the recommendation of the President of the United States. One of the good things that the former President, Mr. Taft, did was to advocate a budget system for the finances of the Government. He gave a great deal of attention and study to it. I do not think he ever received the credit to which he was entitled for the work he did in behalf of the economical administration of the enormous revenues of the United States; but in pursuance of that plan he discussed this question of putting the first and second class post offices upon a business basis and conducting them as they ought to be conducted, in the interest of the service for which they are established.

Mr. President, the reason why there are assistant postmasters in most of the offices is because when some local politician receives the reward for the services which he has rendered to the party that won out in the election, and he is appointed postmaster, he does not know anything about the duties of the office and he has to get somebody to run the office for him. That is the reason why there are assistant postmasters. The assistant postmaster is the man who runs the office. The assistant postmasters could run it just as well, in many cases, if there were not any postmaster there.

Mr. Taft in a message to the Senate and the House of Representatives said.

I have several times called attention to the advantages to be derived from placing in the classified service the local officers under the departments of the Treasury, of the Post Office, of Justice, of the Interior, and of Commerce and Labor. In my message submitted to the Congress on January 17 I referred to the loss occasioned to the Government because of the fact that in many cases two persons are paid for doing work that could easily be done by one. In the meantime I have caused an inquiry to be made as to the amount in money of this loss. The results of this inquiry are that the loss amounts to at least $10,000,000 annually.

That is worth saving, Mr. President, at a time when there is a deficit in the revenues and when you are seeking to recoup those losses out of the salaries of rural carriers and by cutting off the extension of the rural service, of new rural routes. Instead of meeting the deficit in the revenues by a deterioration in the service of the department, you can meet it, in large part, by the changes which I refer to without interfering in the slightest degree with the quality of the service, and, in fact, improving it.

Mr. Taft says:

For example, it appears that a very substantial economy would result from putting experienced and trained officers in charge of the first and second class post offices instead of selecting the postmasters in accordance with the present practice. As the annual operating expenses of the first and second class offices aggregate the enormous sum of more than $80,000,000, undoubtedly if the postmasters of these offices were embraced in the classified service and required to devote all their time to the public service the annual savings would eventually represent many millions of dollars. The saving in salaries alone, not taking into account any saving due to increased efficiency of operation, would amount to about $4,500,000. At the present time the salaries of postmasters of the first and second class amount to $6,076,900, while the salaries of assistant postmasters of the same classes amount to $2,820,000.

Those aggregates have increased since the date of that message and are now the figures which I cited a moment ago. Then the former President proceeded:

If the position of postmaster were placed in the classified service and those officers were given salaries equal to 20 per cent more than the salaries now given to the assistant postmasters, the latter position being no longer required, there would be a saving in salaries to the Government of $4,512,000. In the case of postmasters at offices of the third class a large annual saving could be made.

He repeated that recommendation in another message February 26, 1913, in which he said:

With respect to the first class I have already submitted recommendations to Congress in several messages transmitting reports in which it is estimated that the direct salary cost of the Government may be reduced not less than $4,500,000 a year—this to be done by placing a large proportion of presidential appointments in the classified service. The salaries of postmasters of the first and second classes amount to over $6,000,000, while the salaries of assistant postmasters of the same classes amount to $2,820,000. If the position of postmaster were placed in the classified service, and these officers were given salaries equal to 20 per cent more than the salaries now given to assistant postmasters, the latter positions being no longer required, there would be a saving of $4,512,000. Besides this direct reduction that might be immediately made in the estimates, there would also be very large indirect reductions of cost that might be availed of in future estimates—reductions that can not be realized so long as appointments are on a partisan basis. These unnecessary indirect costs are due to the fact that a considerable part of the services outside of Washington can not be properly brought within the discipline of administrative officers. So long as high salaried local officers owe their appointments to local influence it may be assumed that their tenures will be fairly secure, regardless of their efficiency. This is discouraging to those in equally responsible positions who are rendering efficient service, but who, by reason of the nonpartisan character of the appointment, receive not more than half the amount of salary; it tends to destroy the esprit de corps, especially with subordinates; it carries with it expenditures that in many instances are unwisely made. Altogether, in the opinion of those who are best acquainted with the service, the indirect saving to the Government amounts to more than the direct saving indicated.

Those conclusions of the former President were not based upon mere surmises, but they were based upon the most careful and long-continued examination by a board or a commission created for that purpose called the Commission on Economy and Efficiency. In their report of December 15, 1911, while there are many things in the report that I do not agree with, there are many things that I do agree with. One of those that has merit is this recommendation:

That it be provided by law that all local officers under any of the executive departments (such as customs officers, internal-revenue officers, postmasters—marshals, supervising inspectors in the Steamboat-Inspection Service, commissioners of immigration, registers and receivers of district land offices, surveyors general, pension agents, etc.), who are now appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be appointed by the President alone.

Mark you—

In conclusion, Mr. President, I simply want to say that nothing has been urged against this proposition. I do not think it can be successfully maintained that the efficiency of the service would be interfered with or that the saving which I have stated can not be effected. That being so, I am very much in hopes that there will not be any objection to the amendment which I now offer and ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert, at the end of the bill, the following:

The offices of postmaster and assistant postmaster are hereby abolished in first and second class offices, and in lieu thereof is created the office of superintendent of post office. Each post office of the first and second classes shall be in charge of a superintendent, to be appointed by the Postmaster General. In each such office where there is an assistant postmaster, such assistant postmaster shall be appointed to the office of superintendent of post office, if qualified therefor, and shall hold the same subject to the laws and regulations of the classified civil service. Thereafter all appointments to the office of superintendent of post office shall be made upon merit, and, where practicable, by promotion or transfer from the employees of the Postal Service, and shall hold the office, without regard to politics or political recommendations, upon the terms and conditions and subject to such tenure as is provided by the laws and regulations governing the classified permanent civil service. For compensation to such superintendents of post offices there is hereby appropriated $3,613,279. This section shall not apply to postmasters or assistant postmasters now in office whose terms have not expired, but they shall be allowed to serve out the term for which they were appointed. All acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment that it is new legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after line 9, insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 11. That all pamphlets and other matter relating to elections published by any State or municipal government for use at such elections shall be mailable at second-class mail rates of 1 cent per pound under rules and regulations fixed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I make a point of order against that amendment. It is new legislation and changes existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I have just this moment received a telegram, and as it relates directly to the business of the department to which the pending bill refers, I ask that it be read. It is from the editor of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and is a short telegram. I have also an editorial and a short article from the same paper relating to the same subject, the service in the Philadelphia post office. I simply ask that the newspaper articles be inserted in the RECORD, without reading, and that the telegram be read.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, February 23, 1915.]

SLOW MAIL DELIVERIES.

An attempt is made by the post-office authorities to explain—for they can not justify—the slow delivery of mail in Philadelphia by a reference to the operation of the eight-hour law. It is claimed that there are not enough carriers to arrange for late as well as early deliveries, because the man who begins work at, say, 7.30 in the morning has finished his day by half past 3 or 4, and the number of carriers is too small to permit of two shifts. Moreover, the further explanation is offered that "90 per cent of the mail is ready for the early morning delivery," that the work calls for the full force at that hour, and that it would be bad policy to hamper the early delivery of 90 per cent of the mail for the 10 per cent distributed during the remaining hours of the day.

It is obvious to everyone that this argument is fallacious. Mail accumulates in great volume in the morning, it is true, because many business concerns habitually deposit their mail at the close of the day, but it is also true that if the postal authorities deliberately add to this natural accumulation all the mail which under more scientific methods would be delivered at the close of the day throughout the greater part of the city, that 90 per cent represents a great deal more than the legitimate volume of mail for morning delivery.

The omission of provision for an evening delivery is a serious inconvenience, an admission of inadequacy of service, which no first-class city ought to tolerate. And Philadelphia should insist upon a mail service at least equal to that given by the postal authorities in the larger cities of the world. We are in the habit of lauding American efficiency in business affairs, but the Postal Service is a sorry commentary upon the demoralizing results of an admixture of politics and business in what ought to be one of the most perfectly organized services, so vital is it to the welfare of the people and to the success of their commercial undertakings. Whether the fault lies with local or national mismanagement, it calls aloud for immediate correction.

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger.]

ADVERSE CRITICISM OF POST OFFICE HERE BECOMES GENERAL OVER ENTIRE CITY—BUSINESS MEN COMPARE PHILADELPHIA SYSTEM TO THAT OF ALASKA DURING CLOSED WINTER SEASON.

Criticism against the apparent inability of the local post-office authorities to promptly distribute first-class mail in this city continues to pile up from business men and private individuals, who, by pointing to letters mailed here, some of which were 24 hours in transit, compare the Philadelphia system to that of Alaska during the closed winter season.

The charge by a former employee of the department that mail is permitted to accumulate is borne out by test letters sent by the Public Ledger a few days ago. A case in point is that of a letter mailed at the central post office, Ninth and Chestnut Streets, shortly after 12 o'clock on the noon of February 16, designated for 3014 Salmon street, in the northeastern section of the city. This was received at 1.30 o'clock the following afternoon, being more than 24 hours in transit. The address is within a few squares of the Bridesburg substation, into which, says the department, the mails are carried by trolley.

Another complaint received yesterday declared that a letter posted at the central station at 1 o'clock on Friday for Sixtieth and Market Streets was not received until Monday morning.

The poor showing of Philadelphia in the matter of deliveries as compared with other first-class cities of the country was the subject of a letter from Walter Lippincott, the publisher, who said:

"I read with much interest your article on the inefficiency of the management of our post office, and I am glad the Public Ledger has taken notice of this crying evil. As one of the sufferers I thank you for your effort in their behalf.

"The reason given to me by the post-office officials for the curtailment of deliveries was that the working hours had been reduced from 10 to 8 hours without any increase in the force.

"Furthermore, I learned that New York had three deliveries per day more than Philadelphia, and while the last delivery in Philadelphia was made a little after 4 o'clock, the last delivery in New York was made between 7 and 8 o'clock."

Officials at the post office refused yesterday to discuss the situation. Postmaster Thornton issued a statement that he was preparing an answer from the standpoint of the local department which he would soon make public.

Former officials of this office admit the service manifestly is inefficient and infer that much of the trouble is caused by the "niggardly policy of economy" as enforced by the Post Office Department at Washington, which was, they said, the natural course in view of the recently announced deficit of $30,000,000 in the widespread conduct of the business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 24, 1915.

HON. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Will you kindly use your influence with President, Postmaster General, and proper officials to secure an adequate and efficient postal service for the city of Philadelphia, which is now without free delivery after 2 o'clock each afternoon? This works great injury to business and inconvenience and loss to residents.

EDITOR PUBLIC LEDGER.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire in connection with this bill, which brings up the subject properly, to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of some provision for the retirement of postal employees.

I confess, Mr. President, that in the beginning I was opposed to this proposition. It did not seem to me that the Government ought to go into the business of what has been described as a term of opprobrium as a civil pension list. Then, after I looked into the matter a little further it seemed to me that if the Government did adopt a retirement system, accompanied by some half pay or some proportion of pay, the fund should be made up by contributions in the nature of a relief fund or pension fund made by monthly or periodical payments by the employees.

Then I got a little further, Mr. President, in the lapse of years, and I suppose with wise men it is not an evidence of lack of wisdom to develop and progress and change one's mind, until I became convinced that the only practical system was a system of flat, straight, direct retirement and pension.

I was led to that conclusion also by noticing the development of the corporations of the country, representing large aggregations of capital employing an army of men, who, it seemed to me, according to my study and observation, gradually evolved and developed into the conclusion of a flat, direct retirement system.

In the early days of retirement systems, inaugurated originally, I suppose, by the railroads of the country, we had the relief system and the system of periodical payments on the part of the employee. Those systems have been quite elaborately worked out, and I have no doubt have been beneficent in their results. But we live in an age of rapid development, and the most recent systems adopted by the great corporations of the country have evolved beyond this contributory plan and embody a program of flat retirement.

The United States Government, I might say by way of a preliminary, is the only Government of all the leading civilized Governments in the world that has no system of retirement for its superannuated civil-service employees. The custom or practice of all governments, whether national, State, or municipal, in their dealings with their people and employees certainly should furnish some precedent and example for the Federal Government of the United States. Instead of having the distinction of taking the lead in this kind of legislation and setting the example to States and municipalities, of school boards and corporations, we have invited much harsh criticism and have not in any way taken the initiative in this kind of legislation for the relief of the vast army of the employees under the civil service in the Government.

I will call the attention of the Senate to a few instances of retirement plans for the benefit of employees at present in force. The list includes teachers, firemen, and police pension funds without contributions from salaries. In Maryland we have a teachers' retirement list under the jurisdiction of the State board of education; in Boston, Mass., a permanent pension fund; in New Jersey the entire State has such a system; in New York there is a retirement fund for the College of the City of New York. In Philadelphia we have a private foundation looking to the same end. These are educational. So I might go down the list.

Then we have the list with reference to the firemen's pension fund. We have it in Oakland and San Francisco, Cal.; in New Britain and New Haven, in Connecticut; and so on in a number of towns, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks if there be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

This list includes teachers, firemen, and police pension funds without contributions from salaries.

I will first take up the teachers:

Maryland: Teachers' retirement list, State board of education; Annapolis; entire State.
Massachusetts: Boston; permanent pension fund.
Nebraska: Omaha.
New Jersey: The entire State.
New York: Retirement fund for the College of the City of New York.
Pennsylvania: Philadelphia; Elkin fund.
Rhode Island: The entire State.
South Carolina: Charleston.

The list with reference to the firemen pension funds is as follows:

California: Oakland and San Francisco.
Connecticut: New Britain and New Haven.
Georgia: Savannah.
Maryland: Baltimore.
Massachusetts: Boston, Cambridge, Holyoke, Lowell, and Springfield.
Michigan: Detroit, Grand Rapids, and Jackson.
Nebraska: Omaha.
New York: Albany, Buffalo, Elmira, and New York City.
Ohio: Canton, Columbus, Springfield, Toledo, and Youngstown.
Pennsylvania: Pittsburgh.
South Carolina: Charleston.

The pension list with reference to policemen is as follows:

Connecticut: Hartford, New Britain, and Waterbury.
Florida: Jacksonville.
Georgia: Augusta and Savannah.
Louisiana: New Orleans.
Maine: Portland.
Massachusetts: Boston, Cambridge, Fall River, Holyoke, Lowell, Lynn, Somerville, and Springfield
Michigan: Grand Rapids, Jackson, and Saginaw.
Minnesota: Duluth.
New Jersey: Bayonne and Hoboken.
New York: Buffalo and Elmira.
Ohio: Akron, Columbus, Springfield, and Youngstown.
South Carolina: Charleston.

Retirement under the above funds is in the majority after 20 years of service and over, upon half pay, with disability provision.

I now desire to take up a number of commercial corporations having pension funds without contribution from salaries of the employees.

First is the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., employing 120,311 employees; retired at 60 years of age, with 20 or more years of service, continuously, upon 1 per cent of salary during the 10 years preceding retirement. Disability provision after 10 years or more of continuous service.

American Sugar Refining Co.: Number of employees, 7,500; retired at 60 to 70 years of age, with 20 or more years of service, upon 1 per cent of salary during the 10 years preceding retirement. One reason for deciding against the type of plan which requires contributions from employees was the high cost of living, which would make any tax on salaries a hardship. This is a statement of the directors of the company.

Carnegie Foundation: This grants pensions to teachers of universities, colleges, and technical schools, $15,000,000 having been provided for the purpose. The average retirement allowance is $1,628.41; the maximum allowance is $4,000.

The Consolidated Gas Co., of New York, gives retirement after 35 years' service upon 1 per cent of salary during the five years preceding retirement.

Mr. PENROSE. These systems were started a number of years ago, and furnish a precedent for what there is an increasing demand for every year, and that is for similar action on the part of the Federal Government.

Then, in addition to the pensions for teachers and firemen and policemen, we have the long line of corporations to which I partially referred. We have the Carnegie Foundation giving a pension to teachers in universities, colleges, and technical schools, $15,000,000 having been provided for that purpose. The average retirement allowance is $1,628. The maximum allowance is $4,000.

The Consolidated Gas Co. of New York gives retirement after 35 years' service upon 1 per cent of salary during the 5 years preceding retirement.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire if there is any more reason why an American citizen who is employed by the Government should have a pension when he arrives at a certain age than there is that the citizen who is not employed should have a pension? Should not an old-age pension, if we are going into that policy, be applied to the man who is employed in private life as well as the man employed by the Government, when the money is raised by taxation that furnishes the pension or retired pay?

Mr. PENROSE. Without wanting to depart from the specific subject which is before the Senate and which I have in mind, which is a system of retirement for a definite class of employees, I will depart for a moment to answer the Senator and say that I will be willing to vote at any time for a moderate and conservative old-age pension in the United States. I am not prepared to say that the Federal Government should inaugurate this system, but that rather it should be a matter within the province of the States. But whether it be taken up by the States or by the Federal Government, and the trend nowadays seems to be to throw everything on the Federal Government and ignore the States, I can assure the Senator from Kansas that I am in hearty sympathy, and I believe that some day we may come to it to have a properly guarded old-age pension in this country. They have it in most of the nations of Europe.

It may be that we have not reached the stage in our civilization which renders the need so pressing in America as it is in Germany or in England, but of one proposition I am convinced, that it is better to give a small pension to a superannuated man or woman thrown upon the cold hospitality of the world in their old age, unable to make a living; that it is better to provide for them a small annuity and in the end it will be cheaper than to board them in the poorhouse; that rather we should give them a little provision for the one, two, or three years, the brief period which they may have to remain on earth, so that they may get along as best they may with their families, their relatives, or friends.

There is already in the United States some little beginning of such a system in many of the States in what is known as mothers' pensions. In the State of Pennsylvania the legislature at the last session passed a law providing for a commission in any county in the State and a certain appropriation where the county made an equal appropriation for the support of widows with families, on the ground that it was not only an act of justice and propriety, but that it was better and cheaper for the community, in the long run, than to have the mother and the children go to the poorhouse. But that is neither here nor there; it does not affect the argument which I have in mind.

The Consolidated Gas Co., of New York, gives retirement after 35 years' service upon 1 per cent of salary during the five years preceding retirement. Then the Provident Loan Society, of New York; the Public Service Corporation, of New Jersey; the Standard Oil Co.; and Yale University all have pension systems under the jurisdiction of their boards of trustees. The United States Steel Corporation and the Carnegie Pension Fund involves employees to the number of 225,000 who are retired under various definitions and schedules at certain ages. The railroads I have briefly referred to. I shall not take the time of the Senate by reading the list, but ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

Railroads having pension systems without contributions from the salaries of the employees are as follows:

Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co.
Atlantic Coast Line Railroad.
Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.
Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad.
Brooklyn Rapid Transit Railroad Co.
Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh Railway Co.
Chicago & North Western Railway Co.
Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co.
Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway.
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway.
Cleveland Valley & Terminal Railroad.
Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad.
Illinois Central Railroad.
Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway.
Michigan Central Railroad.
Newburg Railway Co.
New York Central & Hudson River Railroad.
New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad.
New York Railways Co.
Oregon Railroad & Navigation Co.
Oregon Short Line Railroad.
Pennsylvania Railroad, lines east of Pittsburgh.
Pennsylvania Lines, west of Pittsburgh.
Philadelphia & Reading Railway.
Southern Pacific Co.
Union Pacific Railroad.
Washington, D. C., street railway companies.

Mr. PENROSE. They include the Pennsylvania Railroad lines east of Pittsburgh and the Pennsylvania Railroad lines west of Pittsburgh, and the Philadelphia & Reading Railway system in Pennsylvania. The pension allowances granted to employees of these railroads are from 1 to 2 per cent of the average salaries for the 10 years preceding retirement.

Mr. President, I think perhaps that one of the most complete and liberal systems of retirement and pension was inaugurated a year or so ago, on January 1, 1913, according to the prospectus I hold in my hand, by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. I have here "a plan for employees' pensions, disability benefits, and insurance," and I understand the system is in successful operation. Regarding pensions, the prospectus reads as follows:

5. PENSIONS.

1. On and after January 1, 1913:

(a) All male employees who have reached the age of 60 years and whose term of employment has been 20 or more years, and all female employees who have reached the age of 55 years and whose term of employment has been 20 or more years, may, at their own request, or at the discretion of the committee, be retired from active service and become eligible to pensions.

(b) Any employee whose term of employment has been 30 years or more, or any male employee who has reached the age of 55 and whose term of employment has been 25 or more years, or any female employee who has reached the age of 50 years and whose term of employment has been 25 or more years may, on the approval of the president or designated vice president, be retired from active service and granted a pension allowance.

What are these pensions?

2. The annual pension allowance for each employee retired with a pension on account of age or length of service shall be as follows:

For each year of active service 1 per cent of the average annual pay during the 10 years next preceding retirement, provided, however, that the committee may at its discretion base such pension upon the average annual pay of the 10 consecutive years of service during which the retired employee was paid the highest rate of wages. The minimum pension shall be $20 per month.

Certainly a liberal provision on the part of one of the great corporations of the United States.

3. Pensions shall continue from date of retirement to death of pensioner and the committee may in its discretion continue pensions to dependents until end of third calendar month following death.

Then there are other provisions, Mr. President, regarding this system which I do not wish to read to the Senate, because it would delay this discussion, which perhaps has been unduly prolonged, and I feel that the bill can be soon passed, so I will make my remarks brief. This prospectus, however, shows that the system provides for very liberal accident disability benefits, sickness disability benefits, and life insurance. The whole system of this and other corporations having similar systems inaugurated within the last two or three years are well worthy of the careful study of every Member of Congress who may have to pass upon the question of the retirement of Federal employees.

I have here a copy of some hearings held by the House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress, in January, 1912, containing the report of an actuary regarding civil-service pensions, addressed to the then president of the United States Civil Service Retirement Association in Washington. This report is, in my opinon, of great value; and as the hearings may not be available at the present time I ask unanimous consent—the report is not very long—to insert the report as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. During the past year, Mr. President, many of the old employees of the Government, particularly in the Post Office Department, have been discharged and removed. Many have been removed because of the charge of being incapacitated for duty, the penalty of getting old. As an illustration, I have here an article from the Washington Star of December 27, 1914, reciting the case of John W. Grice, who was employed as a watchman in the Post Office Department in 1873, at a salary of $720 a year. In all of that time he had never received one penny of promotion; but, on the contrary, had been for some years subjected to a reduction of pay. On the 14th of December, 1914, he was dismissed from the Government service on account of incapacity due to old age.

He had saved no money, having been singularly thriftless in the management of his munificent stipend of $60 a month, and now he is an object of public charity.

The case is not exceptional. There are many men in the Government service to-day who are getting just the same pay that they got years ago, who have been giving their best years and best energies to their employment, and who are utterly unable to save anything out of their meager pay. They have no prospect of promotion, no chance for outside occupation, and no hope of honorable retirement on a living income.

It is to be doubted whether the average business institution would retain a faithful worker on its pay roll for over two-score years and then drop him without thought for his future care. Yet this is what the United States is doing right along. Watchman Grice, it is explained officially, was treated with consideration, as he had been kept on the rolls for some time when he was of but little use. But that consideration does not avail him now that he has been turned out to become a public charge.

Departmental retirement is said to be unpopular back in the congressional districts. It may be questioned whether the subject has ever been properly stated outside of Washington or the immediate circles of Government employment in other cities—

This reflection on the congressional districts is a quotation from the Washington Star. I quote again:

The American people are not hard-hearted and they surely can not desire to see the public service run on a "Scrooge" basis. Where there is no sympathy for the governmental retirement it is because of a lack of understanding. The case of Grice, if plainly stated to the average American voter, would probably make him feel that the United States is negligent in the matter of making provision for its faithful veteran employees.

I have here, Mr. President, an article from the Inquirer of February 10, 1915, a paper of large circulation in Philadelphia and in the State of Pennsylvania. It is an editorial, and is entitled "Cruel treatment of aged employees." I will not detain the Senate by reading it, but will ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

CRUEL TREATMENT OF AGED EMPLOYEES.

The dismissal of five aged employees from the Chicago post office on account of superannuation and the threatened dismissal of five others at Sioux City for the same reason must cause a feeling of shame to all who believe in justice and fair play, if not in common humanity. That these men should be so ruthlessly cast aside in their declining days is a reflection upon our system of government.

The saddest part of it is that the instances named are not isolated cases. There is no reasonable doubt that hundreds of men have been dismissed recently for the crime of becoming old, and by the representatives of a Government which constantly boasts of how far we are ahead of other nations in furthering the cause of humanity. The remedy for this sort of thing lies in the passage of a fair and reasonable retirement bill. No one believes that men who have outlived their usefulness should be permanently carried on the public pay rolls, but every reasonable person will agree that employees who have given the best years of their lives to the public service and who have a record of efficiency and faithfulness should be cared for in their declining years.

It seems like irony that the Government should be dismissing men for old age at the very moment when big private corporations, which are popularly supposed to have no souls, should be perfecting and putting into practice plans for caring for those who have served them faithfully for a specified term of years. Thus on the very day that we read of the dismissal of the postal employees in Chicago we learn that one of the great telephone companies had paid out in one year the sum of a million dollars for pensions, disability, sickness, and accident. It is said that the cost of maintaining the pension system of that company has been only a little more than 1 per cent of the amount of the pay roll. It is regarded as a great success from every standpoint, because the retirement of the old and infirm employees brings new blood into the establishment and improves the efficiency of the concern.

It is a great pity that a private corporation should be able to do so much better than the United States Government.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President, I deny that some such provision as this is in any way in the nature of a gratuity or a gift. I claim that it can be proven by figures to be not only in the interest of greater efficiency, but in the interest of economy in the administration of the Post Office Department. How does the Government gain by retaining on the pay rolls superannuated employees who are unable to do any work, but whom no one has the brutality or the heart to discharge and render public charges on the community? The Government can not gain by such a system as that, whereas, on the contrary, if the superannuated employee could be retired at half pay, or on any other proper basis, and some active young man or woman, most likely on a salary lower than that which the superannuated employee was receiving, could be assigned to his work and perform his duty to the Government, taking into consideration the zealous, active work of the young man, even though working on a lower salary, and the fact of the Government being relieved of the useless services of the superannuated employee, retired at a much lower compensation than he had been receiving on the active list, the Government certainly might be the gainer, and clearly would not be much the loser from a financial point of view.

Mr. President, on numerous occasions in the last three or four years I have delivered speeches in Pennsylvania and elsewhere advocating these views, which I finally arrived at after starting my study of the question with a prejudice against the proposition based on my ignorance of the facts and the conditions. I feel entirely satisfied from my own experience that anyone who will give the subject the same study that I have done will at least have his views regarding a retirement system much modified, if any prejudice may exist in his mind regarding it.

As long ago as December 8, 1912, I delivered a speech in Philadelphia advocating the proposition which I am now urging on the Senate. In that speech I declared that—

"The United States Government is the only one of the leading Governments of the world that has no system of retirement for its superannuated civil-service employees. In one respect this fact has been unfortunate, because the American Government can well be expected to lead the way in advanced legislation for the good of the people. On the other hand, this advantage has resulted, that we are able to profit by the errors and mistakes and experiments in this and other countries and can perhaps now see our way more clearly than ever before as to the logical lines on which legislation for the retirement of employees in the civil service should be framed.

"It is true that in many respects the Federal Government has been liberal to a degree unparalleled in history in pensions for the soldiers who have fought in the several wars in which the country has been engaged. Nearly $200,000,000 will this year be appropriated for military pensions. Moreover, many of the large industrial corporations in the United States and many more railroads have for a number of years been developing relief pensions and retirement systems. Considerable advance has also been made in the United States in our municipalities and educational systems, particularly in reference to provision for teachers, firemen, and police pension funds. The general question as supplied to the community at large demands thoughtful consideration and practical action, but we now have before us the pressing and specific proposition of adequate provision for the retirement of employees in the civil service. The consideration of this question can no longer be postponed by the American Congress. The time has come when it must be taken up in the light of experience in this and other countries and solved on practical and effective lines. I have every reason to believe that the time is not far distant when some legislation providing for such retirement of a satisfactory character will be enacted by Congress.

"On this as on other questions it has been necessary for the public mind to undergo a considerable education. There has existed among the people a prejudice against a civil pension list. While there has been no difficulty in getting legislation for the well earned and deserved pensions for the veterans of our wars, opposition has frequently developed to any bill providing for pensions for civil employees, and the furthest progress that was made in this direction for a long time was an occasional and often inadequate provision for the pension and retirement of our judges. Opposition has even existed in the ranks of the employees themselves to pension systems proposed by corporations, sometimes based on the terms upon which the pensions were offered and sometimes from the suspicion that in some way a motive existed behind the proposition of coercion, intimidation, or undue control. Gradually, however, these prejudices and misunderstandings are disappearing. The large corporations are rapidly coming into line with pension propositions and provisions, and each new arrangement seems to be more liberal than any of the preceding ones.

"Where all have admitted the desirability of a pension system there has remained one serious difference of opinion as to whether the retirement of the civil-service employees should be based on contributions from salaries or whether it should be a straight retirement and pension without any such contribution or deduction. It is argued that the adoption of a civil-service retirement system should have a contributory feature to it, so as to reduce to the minimum the cost to the Government of the pensions to be paid, but the more we consider the subject and the more carefully we look at the experience of contributory plans which characterize the earlier efforts in this direction, and the further we witness the latest systems of large corporations, the plans of which have been most carefully worked out, the more firmly we are led to the logical conclusion that the civil-service retirement system should be borne and paid for by the Government without any contribution or deduction from salaries, and the retirement should be based upon such length of service and percentage of salary and age as shall be defined by the experts who have studied the question.

"It would be undue hardship, which they could hardly afford, to compel the Government employees, and particularly those in the Postal Service, to pay asessments for the contributory system. The salaries which a large number of them now receive would not permit this on any lines that would meet the requirements of the situation. It is not expected that a satisfactory retirement at the expense of the Government would cost a great deal of money, because the vacancies caused by the retirement of the superannuated would be filled from the lower salaried employees, who would begin at the lowest grades upon entering the service. On the other hand, the Government would be enabled to retire employees who are no longer able, by reason of age, to discharge fully the duties of their position, and many of whom are really only retained now in the service because no provision is made for their retirement.

"The latest and most liberal system of retirement made by a corporation is that of the Bell Telephone system, under which a fund of $10,000,000 for pensions, sick benefits, and life insurance will be available on January 1 for the 175,000 employees of the system. This provision is made entirely at the expense of the various companies interested, without contributions of any kind from the employees themselves. The application of these various benefits will be for the benefit of all employees of every rank. The total yearly pay for the whole group of employees of the Bell system amounts to some $115,000,000. The amount of the pension is automatically based on the years of service and the amount of pay and will be 1 per cent of the average annual pay for 10 years multiplied by the number of years of service.

"Therefore a man who had been 30 years in service would get 30 per cent of the average salary which he had been receiving during his last 10 years of service. No person will be less than $20 per month. Accidents, disability, and death are also liberally provided for, and if any State statute provides for more liberal compensation than is provided under the benefit plan, the statutory provision will prevail. This system will go into effect on January 1 of next year, and I refer to it here because it is the latest and most liberal and comprehensive plan yet advanced by any corporation in the United States.

"I have had, as chairman and member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate for many years, opportunity to realize that the pension system for postal employees is specially desirable. They are out in all kinds of weather, often exposed to the dangers of travel, and the work is exacting and it is by no means overpaid. It requires a high order of men, and, in many branches, much higher educational qualifications than the public have any idea of.

"Another notion which has gradually been given up, but which once prevailed generally and still exists in places, is that in some way the pension system tends to enervate and emasculate employees and causes them to lose zeal or ambition in their work. Experience has shown, however, that the contrary condition results. The employee is supplied with every motive to serve the Government loyally, zealously, and industriously, and to earn by merit such promotion as he can with the assurance that at the end of a period of long and faithful service, as old ages causes his energies to relax, he may have confidence that he will be fully and adequately provided for.

"Many publicists and students of industrial questions, and particularly of industrial insurance systems, have even claimed that the admitted preeminence of Germany in all industrial activities, largely the development of the last 25 years, has been to no small extent due to the system of industrial insurance and pension which the German people were among the earliest to take up and have been the most progressive in perfecting.

"The old-fashioned idea of a pension as an annuity for a stated amount paid when the retiring age is reached and based on contributions from employees, private gifts, and perhaps appropriations by the Government is conceded to be ineffective and unsatisfactory and gives no assurance of solvency. This plan is being supplanted everywhere by the service pension, wherein the allowance made to the employee is a percentage of his average salary for the preceding term of years, multiplied by the number of years of service. The evolution from the contributory plan to the service-pension system is gradually coming to be realized, and the straight retirement and pension at the expence of the Government and without contribution from the employees is the only one that will in the end prove satisfactory and give assurance of solvency."

Mr. President, I hope I have made a sufficient impression on the chairman of the committee, so that he will not raise a point of order on the amendment I am about to offer. It is calculated to give great satisfaction to the employees of the Postal Service, and it is moderate and conservative in its provisions.

APPENDIX.

REPORT OF MR. ABB LANDIS, ACTUARY.

IN RE CIVIL-SERVICE PENSIONS.

A. W. McKEE,
President United States Civil Service Retirement Association,
945 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Pursuant to engagement I have made an estimate of payments proposed for the retirement of employees in the civil service as provided in House bill 9242, introduced by Mr. HAMILL in 1911.

1. The data available for the estimate were the statistics contained in Bulletin 94 (1907) of the Census Bureau. Information in greater detail and more suitable for the computations were prepared in the office of the Director of the Census and furnished to others for similar computations, and in your behalf I made personal request for copies of that data. After much delay in the decision as to whether or not the statistics were at the disposal of the bureau, the information was given the latter part of December that I could have access to photographic copies, provided I came to Washington to see and use them. This statement is made to explain why I used the published statistics in Bulletin 94. Approximate accuracy in the estimate is obtainable from that data, and for all practical purposes reliance may be placed in the results properly deduced from the statistics of that bulletin.

2. The bill could be made clearer in respect of provisions for disabled employees and in regard to compulsory retirement at age 70. I have taken the liberty to construe the provisions of the bill where not clear or specific to accord with general experience and to make possible positive estimates.

3. The computations were made upon the assumptions to follow:

(a) The central age of each age group was taken to represent the age for the group.

(b) That employees will continue until completion of 30 years in service or to attaining age for compulsory retirement on a service pension or previously become eligible for a disability pension.

(c) That high disability rates be employed at ages between 60 and 70 to offset the earlier payments that might be made under the provisions of the bill on account of voluntary retirements at less than 50 per cent of the salary.

(d) That all present employees at attained ages 70 and above and in the service 20 to 25 years are to be retired as disabled on 50 per cent of average salary, those of like attained ages and 15 to 20 years in the service be retired on 45 per cent, and those in service 10 to 15 years at 40 per cent, and those of 5 to 10 years in service and 70 years of age and above be retired at 30 per cent of the average salary; that those employees in the service less than five years and at ages 70 and above be retired at 30 per cent of average salary.

(e) Assume that total and permanent disablement is meant by the words "has became disabled."

(f) That the "average annual salary received for the five years next preceding retirement" be the mean of the average salary for the current period and the average salary for the five years next preceding.

(g) That the computation for disability payment be based upon the salary of the current period and not upon the average salary of the past five-year period, nor the mean of the averages for the current and last five-year periods.

4. The reason for the first (a) assumption is obvious. The method would be more refined to take the central age plus one-half year, but the difference in results would not justify the time consumed in extra computations, even were time allowed before the hearing.

5. The second (b) assumption was necessary and advisable for several reasons. Necessary because there are no voluntary retirement statistics available upon which to estimate the number who would give up a full salary to accept 40 or 45 per cent of a reduced amount in the way of pension. Advisable because common experience and observation force the conclusion that efficient and satisfactory employees render service to secure the stipulated compensation for the support of themselves and their dependents, and few would voluntarily retire to secure 40 or 45 or 50 per cent of an average salary less than that they could earn by continuing at work. We know that the ordinary and general financial condition of those in the civil service is not such as to enable them to voluntarily dispense with 50, 55, or 60 per cent of their present pay. We have reason to believe that those who can render efficient service will continue to do so to the time for compulsory retirement. In this connection it may be stated that this argument (which I hold as sound) tempted me to reduce the estimate of immediate payments, because many who have attained ages 60 and above and in service 30 or more years will not voluntarily retire on 50 per cent of the average salary. I have ignored the possible voluntary retirements at 40 and 45 per cent, but have taken precaution to offset such resulting additional payments by the assumption of a disability rate in excess of the expected at advanced ages, as stated in the third (c) assumption.

6. The fourth (D) assumption is necessary because of the facts that will be developed in actual service under the disability provision, and because of failure in the bill to make provision for retirement allowance at age 70, after attaining which no employee is to be retained. Reference to the probabilities of becoming disabled at age 70 will explain the selection of the retirement percentages given in the fourth assumption.

7. I have been informed that the meaning assigned to "disabled" was intended by the author of the bill.

8. The sixth (F) assumption was considered advisable because the average salary for the "preceding five years," as obtained from the Bulletin, would have been less than the actual average. The average for the current five-year period would have been in excess of the actual, hence the mean between these averages appeared to represent what would be obtained from the facts.

9. The seventh (G) assumption is to produce larger estimates of disability payments as an offset against any payments to those who might enter the service and become disabled between the present date and the future date for which the estimate is made. Where 10, 15, or more years intervene the overstatement is considerable and will exceed the actual payments to entrants during the period and who become disabled. Nevertheless, it is preferable to over rather than under estimate future payments.

10. The treatment of the statistics involved determination of—

(a) The number of employees subject to immediate retirement and the amount of service pensions payable the first year.

(b) The amount of additional service pensions to those continuing from the first year payable in the fifth and any subsequent year.

(c) The amount of disability payments in the fifth (and any subsequent) year on account of previous disablement.

11. That you may be fully advised in regard to the procedure I submit the formulas for the computations:

Immediate pensions.—Payable the first year are the number of pensionable employees multiplied by the per cent of the average salary, determined as heretofore explained. Pensions payable the fifth (or nth) year are the number of present employees multiplied by the probability of surviving to receive the pension $\left(\frac{l_{x+n}}{l_x}\right)$ multiplied by the average salary determined for the nth year (x represents the immediate pension age).

Future pensions.—Payable in the nth year to present active employees were obtained from the formula:

Average salary at age $x+n$ multiplied by number of employees at age x by

where x is the present age; $x+t$ is the retirement age, and where n is greater than t; and l is the number of living according to the selected mortality table; l^i the number living according to the table of disabled lives; l^{aa} the number of surviving active employees and l^{ii} the number of surviving disabled employees—the sum of the two last $\left(l_x^{aa}+l_x^{ii}\right)$ being equal to the assumed number living (l_x) according to the selected mortality table.

Future disability payments.—Due in the nth year to present active employees who become disabled requires the following formula:

Number of employees multiplied by average salary by

$$\left(\frac{l^{ii}_{x+n}}{l^{i}_{x+n}} - \frac{l^{ii}_{x}}{l^{i}_{x}}\right) \times \frac{l^{i}_{x+n}}{l_x^{aa}}$$ where $x+n$ is not greater than the age of retirement.

Where it is greater, then the probability that an active employee at age x will be on the retired list n years hence on account of total and permanent disability is

12. I selected the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality, because it would eliminate a less number on account of death than other standard tables, and thus would tend to prevent an underestimate of future pension payments.

13. I employed probabilities of disability amongst active employees derived by me directly from personal investigation of the disability experience of a number of large American fraternal societies.

14. I employed probabilities of death amongst disabled persons which were derived from the statistical cards secured by me from four American societies.

15. The combined tables were especially prepared for the computations necessary for this report.

16. At this point it may be well to warn against the error of assuming that the disability payments will continue from date of disability to the age of retirement, excepting through discontinuance on account of deaths, as expected from any standard mortality table. The death rate amongst disabled persons is very, very much higher than assumed by the American experience or other ordinary mortality tables. The error would lead to a large overstatement of future disability payments.

STATISTICS.

17. Bulletin 94 gives the statistics concerning 185,874 employees in the civil service, and of these 6,463 might be considered as eligible for pensions under the provision of H. R. 9242.

18. Such an estimate, in my opinion, would overstate largely the amount for which the Government would be called on to pay.

19. I have proceeded on the theory that you desire an estimate that will be reasonably near the facts as developed under the provisions of the bill should it become a law.

20. This procedure will not allow unreasonable assumptions in either direction.

21. It is not reasonable to assume that every employee, who could retire on 40 or 45 per cent of an average salary, will surrender his present pay and leave the service.

22. It is a violent assumption to estimate that all who can retire on 50 per cent of the average salary will quit, while capable of efficient and satisfactory service.

23. Some of the efficient employees, who could secure any rate of pension and be convinced that they could engage in other vocations at a compensation greater than the forfeited Government pay, would leave the service.

24. Probably those who could not render efficient service, or whose necessities would be provided for by the pension to which they would be entitled, would accept the provisions of the bill.

25. After careful consideration, I am convinced that no attempt should be made to directly estimate the probable service-pension payments under the 40 and 45 per cent provisions. Certainly it would be a gross exaggeration to assume that all who could claim such pensions would do so.

26. A study of all the facts and circumstances leads me to believe that ample provision will be made for the payments to those claiming pensions under the provisions for 45 and 40 per cent of average salary by assuming—

First, that all will make claim under the 50 per cent provision, and thus overstate the actual pensions by the amount allowed for those who will not retire; and

Second, that the estimated disability payments will exceed the actual at the pension ages (from 60 to 70 years of age).

27. Of course there will be an underestimate of the aggregate amount of pension and disability payments proportionate to the understatement of the actual number of employees in the civil service.

28. Census Bulletin 94 (in the tables used in my computations) gives the total of 185,874 civil-service employees. A more recent document issued by the Civil Service Commission gives the number as 222,278. Senate Document 745 credits the Official Register with the statement of 286,902. I am informed by you that the actual number is about 250,000, or probably 260,000.

29. Whatever be the true number, the relation will hold between that and the number assumed in the computations, and it will not be difficult to make the estimate for the larger number if the results are reliable when based upon the smaller number.

30. To assure greater reliability in the statistics, I excluded the "unreported" and those on "piecework," aggregating 1,575, thus leaving subject to treatment 184,299 employees at the various rates of compensation and years and ages of service.

31. The statistics being recorded by age groups, it was impossible to accurately determine the number who might retire at age 62 after 25 or more years of employment. The best estimate was to assume that three-fifths of the number in the age group 60–64 were entitled to the 45 per cent pension.

32. After excluding the 1,575, it was found that the number who might be entitled to service pensions under the 50, 45, and 40 per cent provisions was 5,983, and the possible payments in the first year $3,307,200 on estimates of 50, 45, 40, and 30 per cent of an average annual salary of $1,260, as follows:

Years of service.	Present age.	Average salary.	Annual pension.	Amount of pensions.
30 and over	60 and above	$1,260	$630	$1,905,380
25 to 29	62 and above	1,260	567	564,732
20 to 24	65 and above	1,260	504	496,440
	70 and above	1,260	348	339,648
Total possible payments				3,307,200

33. The total annual salaries of the 184,299 employees amount to $172,829,000, or an average of $938 a year.

34. It would be an error to base estimates upon this general average for the reason that salaries are increased with duration of service. For instance:

Period of service.	Average salary.	Period of service.	Average salary.
Under 5 years	$832	25 to 29 years	$1,195
5 to 9 years	963	30 to 34 years	1,227
10 to 14 years	1,036	35 to 39 years	1,269
15 to 19 years	1,092	40 years and over	1,389
20 to 24 years	1,156

35. The large number of employees in the service less than 15 years causes an average salary amongst the 184,299 of $938. But the service pension is to be a percentage of the average salary during the five years preceding retirement, and hence much in excess of the general average.

36. The retirement provisions make 60 years the minimum age, and that provision, as well as the one for 20 years or more of service, enters into the determination of the average salary. It has required the expenditure of much labor to work out the requisite averages, since the age attained and the period of service entered into the determination of the average salary as a basis for disability payments. It is not my purpose to burden the record with statistics, but a few examples may prevent conclusions from estimates on general averages:

Present age (years).	Period of service.	Average salary.	Period of service.	Average salary.
20–24	Under 5 years	$773

IMMEDIATE PENSIONS.

37. Under the assumptions heretofore stated, the number of employees estimated for immediate payments was found to be 4,384, and the first year's pensions $2,440,820, as follows:

Age and length of service.	Number of employees.	Per cent of average salary.	Average pension.	Immediate total pensions.

PAYMENTS IN THE FIFTH YEAR.

38. At the end of the fifth year after the proposed plan goes into effect the service pensions and disability payments are estimated as follows:

To the survivors of those 60 to 64 in first year	$627,220
To the survivors of those 65 to 69 in first year	519,980
To the survivors of those 70 to 74 in first year	494,440
To the survivors of those 75 to 79 in first year	112,436
To the survivors of those 80 in first year	207,750
To the survivors of the immediate pensions	1,961,826
To retired during 5 years from group:
Under 5 years	131,310
5 to 9 years	212,010
10 to 14 years	187,040
15 to 19 years	200,910
20 to 24 years	164,240
25 to 29 years	847,100
30 to 34 years	260,820
35 to 39 years	121,790
40 and more years	37,183
	2,162,403
Total service pensions in fifth year	4,124,325
To disability payments to disabled in group:
Under 5 years	62,635
5 to 9 years	85,180
10 to 14 years	46,966
15 to 19 years	44,774
20 to 24 years	34,395
25 to 29 years	28,735
30 to 34 years	9,313
35 to 39 years	3,284
	311,637
Total payments at end of the fifth year	4,435,962

39. The amount of disability payments in the fifth year will probably be nearer $400,000 than $311,637, for the reason that the inefficient and partially disabled, who could not legally come within the provisions for service pensions, will be considered "disabled" and entitled to disability payments. Under such a construction the Government will receive advantage, because such employees are now retained on the rolls at average salaries much in excess of the disability payments on which they might be retired. The difference between such salaries and the disability pensions probably would cover the salaries for new and fewer employees sufficient to perform the work of those who retire. An additional $100,000 may be added to the estimated disability payments and the amount would remain within reason and be for the good of the service.

40. It may be of value to show the continued payments to those pensioned in the first year to indicate the progress toward extinction of pensions after they have been incurred:

Payments in the first year	$2,440,820
Payments in the fifth year	1,866,000
Payments in the tenth year	1,259,200
Payments in the fifteenth year	707,859

Payments in the twentieth year	$296,470
Payments in the twenty-fifth year	77,773
Payments in the thirtieth year	8,757

41. While pensioners are going on the list, they are also going off, and ultimately the service and disability annual payments will become constant, assuming a constant number of employees. It is probable that this Government will continue to grow and prosper and that the number of employees in the civil service will continue to increase and the aggregate pensions may continue to increase, but that fact does not change the relation of the Government to its servants. If it be right and just and expedient to have a pension scheme for 200,000, it is expedient and just and right to continue the plan for 300,000, when the Government service requires that number of employees.

42. In coming to some conclusion in regard to the liability involved by inaugurating such a scheme as proposed in House bill 9242 it is permissible and necessary to assume an ultimate constant number of employees. The resources of the Government are also assumed to remain constant. If there be a continued increase in employees, there will be a corresponding increase in the importance of governmental affairs.

43. To forecast the future expenditures for service and disability payments, it should therefore be assumed that the same number of employees enter and leave the service each year.

44. Of the total exits it may be assumed (from experiences of pension funds) that 57 per cent will be from withdrawals, 30 per cent from retirements, and 13 per cent from deaths.

45. While pensions tend to persistency in service, this applies more especially to those who have remained upward of 10 years in the work. A pension of 40, 45, or 50 per cent at the end of 20, 25, or 30 years, and at no age under 60 years, is too far removed and not sufficiently alluring to hold young and recent entrants who believe they can improve their condition by withdrawal.

46. The employees advanced in age and period of service will persist, but the experience in the operation of pension funds shows a heavy withdrawal rate in early years of service.

47. This fact is important in estimating the future number of pensioners.

48. Ultimately, when the number of employees becomes practically constant, and the entrants and exits are equal, it will be found that about 57 per cent of the total exits is due to withdrawals, 30 per cent to retirements, and 13 per cent to deaths while in the service.

49. The per cent of total service pensioners to the total of employees will always be small. Any computation that ignores the withdrawal rate will greatly exaggerate the ultimate pension payments when undertaking to forecast the future cost of any pension scheme.

50. To attempt to estimate the amount of pension payments 20, 30, or 50 years hence by reduction of present employees through deaths only will produce results far in excess of those actually realized.

51. The proportionate distribution of employees according to ages and years of service will not be greatly different in the next 30 years from that now existing, whether or not we have any pension scheme. The present distribution shows a very low average age for employees, as indicated below:

Age distribution.

Age.	Number at entry ages into service.	Number at present ages.
Under 20 years of age	6,866	3,175
20 to 24 years of age	34,960	18,681
25 to 29 years of age	44,654	29,341
30 to 34 years of age	35,169	31,793
35 to 39 years of age	23,639	29,019

40 to 44 years of age	14,392	21,398
45 to 49 years of age	10,185	17,879
50 to 54 years of age	6,893	11,771
55 to 59 years of age	4,070	7,917

75 to 79 years of age	55	462
80 and over	2	137
Grand total	184,299	184,299

52. It will be observed that 145,288 of the total of 184,299 entered the service under 40 years of age, being 78.83 per cent, while 112,009 (61.25 per cent) are at present ages under 40. The number in service less than 20 years is 91.53 per cent of the total as shown below:

Service distribution.

Under 5 years in service	89,395
5 to 9 years in service	45,034
10 to 14 years in service	19,065
15 to 19 years in service	15,198

35 to 39 years in service	1,229
40 years in service	1,050
Grand total	184,299

53. In Senate Document No. 745 an official is quoted as stating that 8,082 civil-service employees are stricken from the rolls each year on account of deaths, withdrawals, and removals. I think it is within the facts to assume that not exceeding 1,050 exits are due to death, leaving about 7,000 loss to the service from withdrawals and removals. It can be safely assumed that retirement on pension would be substituted for present removals for inefficiency where physical condition, age, or service allowed the pension.

54. There is little doubt of the further fact that many aged and physically infirm, now carried on the rolls through sympathy and whose salaries are in the nature of compassionate allowances, would be retired as disability pensioners to the benefit of the service and to the saving of from 50 to 70 per cent of the salaries of the large majority thus affected.

55. The result of inaugurating a pension plan, as proposed in House bill 9242, would be to somewhat reduce the rate of removal for inefficiency due to inability to perform duties on account of physical condition, and would greatly improve the service by permitting supervising officials (with human sympathy and compassion) to retire those physically inefficient who are now carried at salaries in excess of the value of service rendered, and in excess of the disability retirement pension provided in the bill.

56. From a comparison of average salaries at the advanced ages with those for younger ages, on the same length of service, it would appear that supervision now tends to a reduction of pay where the latter is in effect a pension. No doubt this now is accomplished through transfer from one position to another of less responsibility or simpler duties and with correspondingly reduced pay. A similar (and just) method of treatment would induce retirements on pensions of 30, 40, and 50 per cent of average salaries in cases where the employees did not appreciate their failing powers and did not voluntarily retire.

57. The disability provision in the bill is most commendatory in the way of granting relief to the comparatively few at younger ages who become totally and permanently disabled, and is one of the most important provisions in the way of promoting efficiency without violating the promptings of human sympathy and compassion. Men who are accepted by the Government as servants and become inefficient by virtue of age before the period of service entitles them to a service pension should not be, and are not, summarily discharged. However, they now become a clog upon efficiency and an expense to the Government. The disability provision in the bill would do justice to the aged employees and benefit the service by a relief not otherwise obtainable.

58. Because there are comparatively few cases of total permanent disability amongst the great mass of active employees there appears a disposition to slight or ignore the disability provision of the bill, which is one of its most important features (most important in so far as it affects the humanitarian treatment of employees, in ridding the service of the inefficient from physical disability, especially due to advanced age).

59. Excepting for the fact that I have given the question thought and consideration, there would be no material value to any general opinion expressed by me, and I assume your request for an expression is based upon a presumed knowledge of pension schemes.

60. For many years pension funds have existed and actual experience has demonstrated the need for them in public and private service.

61. The relations between the private employer and his employee differ from those of the Government toward the public servant, and there should be a different pension scheme in respect of these two classes of employees.

62. The Government should provide a direct pension for its civil-service employees, but the payment should not be based on the value of service rendered by the active employee.

63. As servants of the Government men are of varying value, according to natural ability, experience, skill, peculiar personal fitness, alertness, and general intelligence.

64. As pensioners of the Government all should have equal consideration as human beings deserving of retirement from long service into a comfortable state of existence for the remainder of life.

65. The amount necessary for a comfortable existence to the average aged or disabled person should be determined, and that amount should fix the pension for every retired employee. Each and every pensioner is a human being and a citizen, and no one of them should be favored above another.

66. Those capable of commanding large compensation while in active service naturally accustom themselves to conditions that require larger expenditures than demanded by the conditions of those receiving smaller pay. Undoubtedly it would be a greater personal sacrifice for those of the first class than for those of the second to adapt themselves to a moderate pension. That fact, of previous personal expenditures and previous pay received for valuable services, has influenced legislators in taking the salary as the basis for pensions.

67. There is no relation between the compensation to which an employee is entitled and the pension he should receive in order to prevent him from becoming an object of charity after devoting the energies of a lifetime to the public service.

68. No employee should be influenced by the character and amount of pension to the belief that he has any "vested interest" in the payment that might be made to him. He should not be led to consider it as "deferred payment" through basing the assurance of it upon the salary he may now or hereafter receive.

69. Every employee should receive a salary commensurate with service rendered.

70. After faithful and efficient service has been rendered for a sufficient period of time, the Government should retire every employee under the guaranty of a comfortable existence for the remainder of life.

71. Those who have been able to earn a large salary should be held responsible for its proper expenditure. Knowing that the pension would be moderate and uniform for all pensioners, these employees would realize the necessity of saving for the future a portion of current salary if they desired to continue the luxuries of life after retirement.

72. The evils that have developed under direct-pension plans have arisen from the erroneous basis of pension payments.

73. To grade the pension by previous salary begets extravagance amongst those who receive large salaries.

74. To grade the pension by previous salary leads to the idea that the pension is "deferred pay," with resulting abuses.

75. To grade the pension by previous salary produces a wrong conception of the true nature of retirement allowances and the real purpose for which pensions are granted.

76. A fair and adequate salary is the due of everyone who can render efficient and satisfactory service.

77. A moderate pension assures comfort in old age, and this should be the last situation of every man and woman, regardless of past condition or previous service.

78. A universal pension is the social need.

79. In the absence of a governmental pension scheme for the whole body politic, the justice of a plan for those who spend their lives and energies in the public service is generally recognized.

80. The basic principles underlying the limited plan should not differ from those of a universal scheme along the lines of the recent superannuation plan adopted in Great Britain.

81. I am well aware that this opinion concerning the determination of a pension is not in accord with prevailing practices or proposed measures.

82. In providing the money for salaries the people at large pay for value received in the way of service.

83. In providing the money for pensions the people would contribute toward the maintenance in comfort of faithful servants. These contributions would be made in the spirit that has prompted recognition from just men since the beginning of service by one person to another.

84. After having received fair compensation for work performed, employees should not ask for more than the assurance of a comfortable and modest living after their retirement.

85. The people would commend an act of the Congress which made reasonable and moderate provision for superannuated and disabled civil-service employees.

86. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether or not the act would meet popular approval if the pension is virtually to replace the salary paid for service.

87. The employees should not permit selfish desire to get the better of sound discretion in the advocacy of pension payments.

88. They should look at the question from the viewpoint of the people who are to provide the funds.

89. The objections against direct pensions (many of which are vigorously presented in S. Doc. No. 745) logically could not be urged if the tendency to abuse were removed by making the retirement allowance unattractive except as a protection against want and destitution after earning capacity has failed.

90. A provident spirit and a habit of saving and a feeling of independence would be instilled, promoted, and encouraged when employees felt that they must lay by something for the future if they wanted more than a modest, comfortable living after retirement.

91. I dwell upon this thought because I believe it is the interest of employees to favor an act of the Congress which will meet popular approval and keep the ultimate annual payments within a reasonable amount not burdensome to the taxpayers. I try faithfully to serve those who employ me, my advice being according to my convictions, hence the earnestness of these lengthy comments.

THE CONTRIBUTION PLAN.

92. The Congress should not adopt any "savings-bank and annuity" plan, as proposed in S. 1944, H. R. 22013, or H. R. 729, or any other proposition which makes the Government the caretaker of money belonging to individuals, under a compulsory system of deposits. It is of questionable policy and a doubtful constitutional procedure.

93. Theoretically the plan may be indorsed as actuarially sound.

94. From the practical viewpoint I doubt if many actuaries would commend the plan to our Government for three reasons:

First. The accumulation of a few thousand dollars subject to draft would cause men to withdraw to enter inviting (or apparently inviting) pursuits where efficiency coupled with a small capital would offer (or appear to offer) greater opportunities than continuing in the service. The tendency would be to lose the efficient and force the retention of the less efficient in the Government employ.

Second. When employees observed the working of the annuity plan very few would enter upon their pensions, but would demand cash payment on attaining the retirement age. Only those in good health and with the anticipation of many years of life would have any inducement to purchase an annuity with their accumulation.

To enter upon the pension (as proposed in bills before the Congress) would mean a forfeiture of the accumulation not consumed in pension payments prior to death. It would not be long before employees would condemn the annuity plan, when they saw retired associates, with $6,000 or $7,000 of accumulation, draw $75 or $1,000 in pensions and then die and have the remainder of the fund forfeited to the Government to enable it to continue payments to other pensioners. A general repudiation of the annuity and a demand for cash settlement at age of retirement would cause the failure of the annuity scheme by subjecting the Government to loss on the persistent lives that entered upon their pensions. The life insurance companies of America and the Government of Great Britain have been losers through granting annuities.

Third. Fifty, sixty, or seventy years is a short period in the life of a republic which is expected to exist forever. At the end of some such period, in the progress of the "saving bank and annuity" scheme, the Government would be in the position of a billionaire investor under the necessity of continually and forever holding safe securities in an amount equal to the enormous accumulation of its employees, and yielding interest income sufficient to enable it to keep its pledges with its enforced depositors. The mere suggestion of this future position condemns the policy as one wholly unsuited to any government, especially one under republican form.

95. It is conceded that the great majority of employees from their present salaries could not afford the required deductions as proposed. It is further conceded that an increase in salaries is necessary to make the plan practical.

96. An increase of salaries to make the plan workable means that the Government must in fact provide for the annuities.

97. It is contended that even though this is true, the fact that the amount of the salary increase is invested gives the advantage of interest accumulation and makes the salary increase much less than the annual pension payments, and therefore is a saving over the direct-pension plan.

98. The contention is supported by fact in the statement that it would require a smaller annual appropriation for each year during the accumulation period than for each year thereafter for annuity or pension payments (provided all of the retiring employees entered upon the pensions).

99. To secure this conditional saving the Government must tax the people for 20 to 50 years before the income is needed for distribution, and in the meantime must assume the responsibility of safely investing hundreds of millions of dollars with required interest income of doubtful realization.

100. It would be better governmental policy and more nearly in accord with popular sentiment amongst the employees and the people to make direct appropriations as needed, rather than anticipate some saving many years hence at the risk not only of financial loss incident to the investment of such vast sums, but at the risk of graft and of political demoralization resulting from the handling of the millions of accumulation, to say nothing of the moral and ethical nature of a political system which assumes control of the funds of individuals, nolens volens, and places them at the possible disposition of party manipulators.

101. Accepting assumptions and methods of computations set forth in public documents of the House and Senate, and using the data of Census Bulletin 94, it would appear that the total accumulation under proposed contribution plans ultimately would not fall much short of $1,000,000,000.

102. A rough estimate easily may be made from figures given in this report. Assuming an average annual salary of $1,200, an interest rate of 3½ per cent, an average monthly deduction from salary of $6, and total employees of 184,299, the accumulation in 22 years would be about $444,000,000.

103. The accumulation would reach its maximum when the annual contributions by employees plus the annual interest income from invested funds equal the total annual payments, or somewhere between 50 and 80 years, according to circumstances affecting the accumulation arising out of interest accretions, management of the fund, and conditions in the service.

104. I present a rough (though accurate as to scale) diagram which graphically illustrates the progress of accumulation in a pension fund and will reflect the general situation that may develop under proposed contribution plans.

105. The age of the fund is represented by the base line from 0 to 90 years.

106. The amounts of the accumulation, the payments, and the contributions are indicated by the points on the scale from 0 to 65; that is to say, the line from A to F represents the maximum accumulation; A to P the constant annual payments to pensioners; A to C the constant annual contributions; and C to P the constant annual interest income.

107. The diagram makes plain the necessity for an enormous accumulation, where the annual pension payments are large, by showing the relative amounts of annual contributions and annual interest income. The accumulation must be large to steadily and continuously produce the annual interest income, which latter will be from 8 to 11 times the amount of the annual contributions, according to the rate of interest earned.

108. The people would never sanction a scheme that contemplated such accumulation as needed for the proposed "Savings bank and annuity" plans. The plan is not within the legitimate functions of government, and the presence of the fund would invite abuses certain to develop.

I ask to have the Secretary read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 26, it is proposed to insert:

An employee in the Postal Service who has served for a period of 25 years or more can be recommended by the postmaster of the city in which he is employed, or other authorized officer, for indefinite leave of absence to the Postmaster General under the following conditions: An employee who has become incapacitated from performing his duties through superannuation shall appear before a board of examiners appointed by the Postmaster General, who shall serve without compensation, with the exception of a physician, who must examine the applicant and make minute inquiry into his physical condition, and make a report of their findings to the Postmaster General. If the application for indefinite leave of absence is recommended by the board of examiners and approved by the Postmaster General, the applicant shall be granted an extended leave of absence, together with an allowance of $600 per annum. This allowance shall be divided pro rata into equal daily installments and shall be payable monthly. If it is found necessary to employ a substitute to fill the place of an employee who has been granted an extended leave of absence, said substitute shall be paid at the rate allowed for vacation work: Provided, however, That this will in no way interfere with the substitute's promotion provided a vacancy in the regular force occurs and said substitute is in line for promotion by virtue of his standing on the substitute list: Provided further, That the Postmaster General can order an employee who is on an extended leave of absence to report for duty at the office in which he was last employed during seasons of the year when the mail is extraordinarily heavy and the services of the employee could be utilized to good advantage: Provided further, That in the event of an employee being required to perform duty during such emergency periods he shall not receive any extra compensation for such service other than the allowance granted him while on an extended leave of absence.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that the amendment is new legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the conference committee on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19422) may be taken up and agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Maryland what points of difference still exist between the conferees?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that the conference report has been printed. Quite a number have been agreed to, and there are only three items upon which the conferees have disagreed.

Mr. BRISTOW. What are those items? That is the inquiry I am making.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The items on which there is still a disagreement are the half-and-half principle, the comfort station, and the appropriation for the Emergency Hospital. Those are the three items upon which the conferees have been unable to agree. We desire to have the items upon which they have agreed adopted by the Senate, so that the report may go over to the House and the other matters may be taken up.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand, then, the Senator asks that the agreements at which they have arrived shall be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That is correct.

Mr. BRISTOW. Approved by the Senate, and that the three items referred to are still in conference?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Still in conference, and that conferees may be appointed to act upon those matters.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no objection at all to agreeing to the items, so far as the committee has agreed, but I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland in relation to the appropriation for the Emergency Hospital. Is the cause of the disagreement that the House disagrees in toto to any appriation at all being made?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The House has disagreed upon the amount. Of course, I do not know what they may do, but they disagreed upon the amount that the Senate committee put in, and also upon the item for the comfort station and the item relating to the half-and-half principle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. GALLINGER conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up and consider Order of Business No. 899, being Senate bill 6493, for the appointment of an additional judge in the fifth judicial circuit of the United States. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and is an urgent matter.

Mr. PENROSE. What is it about?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is a bill for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the fifth circuit of the United States. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the fifth judicial circuit of the United States an additional circuit judge, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall possess the same qualifications and have the same powers and jurisdiction and entitled to the same salary now provided by law in respect to the present circuit judges therein.

SEC. 2. That in the event of a vacancy after such appointment in the office of any of the circuit judges of said fifth judicial circuit of the United States such vacancy shall not be filled by appointment until the number of judges who are able to serve actively shall be reduced to less than three.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1017, Sixty-third Congress, third session.]

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE, FIFTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, which has had under consideration the bill (S. 6493) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge in the fifth judicial circuit of the United States, report the same back to the Senate and recommend its passage without amendment.

As showing the necessity and urgency of the passage of this bill there are appended hereto, first, a letter from the Attorney General of the United States dated September 19, 1914; and, second, two letters from the clerk of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, one dated October 3, 1914, the other dated November 9, 1914.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I herewith inclose draft of a bill (S. 6493) introduced by Senator SHEPPARD. He has asked me to send you a copy of it and give you a statement of the conditions requiring its passage. The following situation exists in the fifth judicial circuit of the United States:

Judge A. P. McCormick will be 82 years old next December and has not been upon the bench for some 18 months. He has been in an invalid's chair for a year or more and is wheeled around by an attendant. He has been living at Waco, Tex., during the period referred to and will never occupy the bench again. I am reliably informed that he admits that fact, but says he will not retire. Judge Pardee was 77 years old last March, and Judge Shelby died a few weeks ago and his successor has not been appointed.

During the long absence of Judge McCormick from the bench the business of the court has been very badly demoralized. The two circuit judges frequently constitute the entire court, and district judges are from time to time sent to occupy the chair of Judge McCormick. This has likewise resulted in disorganization in the districts of the circuit and has been quite expensive to the Government. I am reliably informed that Judges Pardee and Shelby have earnestly urged some arrangement which would improve this unfortunate state of affairs.

Under these circumstances I unqualifiedly approve this bill and hope that it may be passed at as early a date as practicable.

I understand that a similar bill has been introduced in the House by Congressman SLAYDEN. My recollection is that a bill of this kind was passed by Congress when Judge Rector, of the northern district of Texas, became incapacitated by serious illness from performing the duties of his office.

Respectfully, T. W. GREGORY, Attorney General.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT,
New Orleans, La., October 3, 1914.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
Chairman, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your two telegrams of even date. In reply thereto I beg to say:

The number of cases filed per annum for the past five years, the number of cases disposed of, and undisposed of during the same period, as reported to the Attorney General, at the close of the fiscal years, were as follows:

Year.	Filed.	Disposed of.	Undisposed of.
1910	138	149	89
1911	144	127	106
1912	142	158	85
1913	145	141	89
1914	140	131	98

The number of cases undisposed of on June 30, 1914, as per my report to the Attorney General, amounted to 98. Since then 43 have been filed, making a total of 141 cases undisposed of at this date. The court meets at Atlanta, Ga., on October 5; at Montgomery, Ala., on October 19; and at Fort Worth, Tex., on November 2, 1914, during which sessions 82 cases, out of said total of 141 remaining undisposed of at this time, are assigned for hearing. The balance will be assigned at New Orleans at the session set for the third Monday in November.

The time required to dispose of a case after it is filed depends largely upon when it is filed before the session of the court at which it is returnable. If filed as early as two weeks, or, in some instances, a week, before the term begins, if the record is ready, and application therefor is made, it is assigned at the term about to begin. If this can not be done, the case may, on stipulation of the parties, filed with the clerk and approved by the court, be assigned for hearing at any other place or session of the court.

The court keeps up pretty well with its docket. The bulk of the cases undisposed of, as per the reports to the Attorney General, are usually cases that come in after the terms at Atlanta, Montgomery, and Fort Worth have been held, and no request is made for their transfer, the parties desiring to await the sessions at said places.

Respectfully,

FRANK H. MORTIMER, Clerk.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT,
Fort Worth, Tex., November 9, 1914.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 3d instant, forwarded here, where the United States circuit court of appeals is now sitting, asking answers to the following queries:

First. The last time Circuit Judge A. P. McCormick took part in any case pending in the circuit court of appeals?

Second. What effect on the disposition of cases pending in that court has his failure to take part had?

Third. What additional cost to the Government has his absence entailed?

In answer to the first, I would say that the last time Judge A. P. McCormick sat in the circuit court of appeals, as shown by the minutes of the court, was March 5, 1912. The last time he took part in any case pending in said court was on September 5, 1914, when he granted an order staying proceedings in the District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi in the bankruptcy case of Clark, Herrin & Campbell Co., petitioner, v. H. B. Claflin & Co. et al., respondents, until the disposition in this court of the petition to superintend and revise therein.

In answer to the second query I can only reply that Judge McCormick's absence from the circuit court of appeals during the last two or three years has made it requisite to call district judges from parts of the circuit to sit in his stead. This has resulted in some delays in the final disposition of cases, as the judges called in could only be spared from the districts for a short time, and sometimes the necessary consultations were delayed or were carried on by correspondence.

I have no data upon which I can answer the third query.

Yours, very truly,

FRANK H. MORTIMER, Clerk.

NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 238) giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the forty-ninth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the months of September and October, 1915, and for other purposes incident to said encampment, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate act upon it at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the joint resolution read.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Utah that this is exactly the same resolution that was passed five years ago, and it is to regulate the affairs of the District of Columbia during this encampment the same as was done at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply ask that the resolution may be read for information before giving consent to its consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to make such special regulations for the occasion of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, which will take place in the District of Columbia from September 27 to October 2, 1915, as they shall deem advisable for the preservation of public order and the protection of life and property, to be in force one week prior to said encampment, during said encampment, and one week subsequent thereto. Such special regulations shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers of the District of Columbia, and no penalty prescribed for the violation of such regulations shall be enforced until five days after such publication; and said commissioners are authorized and directed to establish a special schedule of fares, applicable to public conveyances in said District, during the period aforesaid. Any person violating any of the aforesaid regulations or the aforesaid schedule of fares shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the said District, be liable for such offense to a fine not to exceed $100, and in default of payment of such fine to imprisonment in the workhouse (or jail) of said District for not longer than 60 days. This resolution shall take effect immediately upon its approval, and the sum of $11,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia, in equal parts is hereby appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to carry out the provisions of this section 1 of this joint resolution, $1,000 of which shall be available for the construction, maintenance, and operation of public-comfort stations and information booths, under the direction of said commissioners.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the committee on illumination of the citizens' executive committee for the entertainment of the forty-ninth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to stretch suitable conductors, with sufficient supports wherever necessary, for the purpose of effecting the said illumination within the District of Columbia: Provided, That the said conductors shall not be used for the conveying of electrical currents after October 2, 1915, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the streets and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before October 20, 1915: Provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced; that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public; and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: Provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removing of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia: And provided further, That if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illumination purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia that the work of erection and removal of said wires shall be under the supervision of the official in charge of said work or reservation.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized to loan to the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of street decorations, or his successor in said office, for the purpose of decorating the streets of the city of Washington, D. C., on the occasion of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, 1915, such of the United States ensigns, flags (except battle flags), signal numbers, etc., belonging to the Government of the United States, as in their judgment may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of the encampment. The loan of the said ensigns, flags, signal numbers, etc., to said chairman shall not take place prior to the 15th day of September and shall be returned by him by the 15th day of October, 1915.

SEC. 4. That for the protection and return of said ensigns, flags, signal numbers, etc., the said chairman, or his successor in office, shall execute and deliver to the President of the United States, or to such officer as he may designate, a satisfactory bond in the penalty of $50,000, to secure just payment for any loss or damage to said ensigns, flags, and signal numbers not necessarily incident to the use specified.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant permits to the citizens' executive committee for the entertainment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the use of any reservation or other public spaces in the city of Washington on the occasion of the forty-ninth national encampment, in the months of September and October, 1915, which, in his opinion, will inflict no serious or permanent injuries upon such reservations or public spaces, or statuary therein; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate for such and other purposes on the occasion aforesaid such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in said city of Washington as they may deem proper and necessary: Provided, however, That all stands and platforms that may be erected on the public spaces aforesaid shall be under the supervision of the said citizens' executive committee and in accordance with plans and designs to be approved by the Architect of the Capitol, the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the building inspector of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to loan to the chairman of the medical department of the forty-ninth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, or his successor in said office, for the purpose of caring for the sick, injured, and infirm on the occasion of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic in the months of September and October, 1915, such hospital tents and camp appliances and other necessaries, hospital furniture, and utensils of all descriptions, ambulances, horses, drivers, stretchers, and Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the Government of the United States as in his judgment may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of the encampment: Provided, That the said chairman, or his successor in said office, shall indemnify the War Department for any loss to such hospital tents and appliances as aforesaid not necessarily incident to such use.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, Mr. President. I understand that a similar resolution was passed five years ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the committee will be stated.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 23, before the word "section," to strike out "this," so as to read:

This resolution shall take effect immediately upon its approval, and the sum of $11,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia, in equal parts, is hereby appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to carry out the provisions of this section 1 of this joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 6, to strike out the word "work" and insert the word "park," so as to read:

That if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illumination purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia that the work of erection and removal of said wires shall be under the supervision of the official in charge of said park or reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the following report of the committee.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 7569. Charles H. Nelson, of Waterville, Me., is shown by the War Department records to have enlisted August 2, 1862, as a private in Company G, Nineteenth Maine Infantry, and to have been discharged

March 17, 1863, for physical disability, namely, phthisis pulmonalis. He again enlisted February 2, 1865, in Company F, Twelfth Maine Volunteer Infantry, and was honorably discharged, with rank of sergeant, March 3, 1866.

Soldier filed and established a claim for pension under the general law for chronic diarrhea and disease of lungs, and was originally pensioned therefor at $6 per month from discharge; increased to $8 October 12, 1881, and to $10 May 9, 1900. He is now pensioned under the age-and-service act of May 11, 1912, at the rate of $21.50 per month. (Certificate No. 199519.)

This soldier is now 72 years of age. He has not been examined by a board of surgeons since May 9, 1900, when he was rated $10 on chronic diarrhea, impaired digestion, and piles; $6 on disease of lungs, and $4 on disease of heart. Medical evidence filed with this committee shows that claimant is at present in a helpless condition, requiring the constant services of an attendant. The following being the report of the physician:

"That he is now and has been for some time totally incapacitated, requiring the constant services of an attendant, and in my opinion he never will be any better. He is now suffering from a complication of diseases and general breakdown."

Neighbors testify that soldier is entirely helpless and requires the constant care of an attendant, and that he has no property whatever. His case is worthy of favorable consideration, and your committee recommend increase of pension to $50 per month, as proposed in the bill.

S. 7670. James H. Loughman, of South Bend, Ind., was a private in Company B, One hundred and thirty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted May 2, 1864, and was honorably discharged and mustered out June 25, 1865. The records show that he was taken prisoner in action at North Mountain, Va., July 3, 1864, and confined in Andersonville Prison for nearly 10 months, being paroled June 25, 1865.

Soldier filed and established a claim for pension under the general law for disease of rectum, and was originally pensioned therefor at $2 per month from June 26, 1888, increased to $6 March 2, 1895, and to $8 September 26, 1906. He might have drawn pension from discharge had he applied in time, but he refused to file his claim until after the expiration of the "arrears" act, and so saved the Government some hundreds of dollars. He is now pensioned under the age-and-service act of May 11, 1912, at the rate of $20 per month. (Certificate No. 917382.)

This soldier is now upward of 70 years of age. He has not been examined by a board of surgeons since September 26, 1906, when he was rated $8 on disease of rectum, $6 on disease of heart, $6 on rheumatism, and $6 on diarrhea, and the examining surgeons reported in direct terms that he was not physically able to perform manual labor. Papers filed in the claim at the Pension Bureau show that claimant suffered a stroke of apoplexy in April, 1914, and since then has been paralyzed and helpless, confined to his room and bed, unable to walk or feed himself, and requiring the constant services of an attendant night and day. The chairman of the committee is also reliably informed that claimant is helpless from paralysis and requires the aid and attendance of other persons at all times; that he is also poor and without means and is worthy and deserving of relief. His case excites great sympathy, and your committee report the bill favorably with recommendation for increase of pension to $50 per month.

S. 7657. Roderick O'Connor, of Buffalo, N. Y., served in the Civil War as a private and corporal in Company C, One hundredth New York Volunteer Infantry. He was a good soldier and has a first-class record, having enlisted July 31, 1862, and being honorably discharged June 15, 1865, after nearly three years of continuous service. He has a record of wound in action at Darbytown Road, Va., October 27, 1864.

Soldier filed and established a claim for pension under the general law and is pensioned by certificate No. 174654 at $20 per month for gunshot wound of nose and resulting catarrh, causing severe deafness of left ear and slight deafness of right ear. He was originally pensioned at the ridiculously small rate of $1 per month from discharge; increased to $4 February 2, 1881; to $8 December 11, 1880; and to $20 November 19, 1890. It has thus been 24 years and more since he has had any increase at the Pension Bureau.

Soldier is 68 years of age and, as the evidence shows, totally disabled and in destitute circumstances. The following affidavits accompany the bill:

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 29, 1914.

To the Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: Your petitioner, Roderick O'Connor, was a corporal in Company C, One hundredth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, during the Civil War, and is 68 years of age. His post-office address is 149 Parkdale Avenue, city of Buffalo, State of New York, county of Erie. He is a pensioner of the United States for disability and draws a pension of $20 per month, granted March 28, 1891. (Certificate No. 174654.) He was wounded in the nose on October 27, 1864, in front of Richmond, the bone or bones of his nose being shattered. He was taken to the hospital at City Point, Va., where fever ague developed, remaining there eight days, and from there sent to the hospital at Fortress Monroe, where erysipelas developed and was kept there six weeks.

The above facts are given to show that while he suffered from the above ailments proper attention could not be given to the gunshot wound and the bone of the nose was not removed at that time or since. The advice of eminent surgeons has been not to attempt an operation. He has been unable to breath through his nose these past 50 years, and this condition has caused him to become deaf and has impaired his eyesight. He is now suffering from rheumatism and is wholly incapacitated and unable to work.

His physical condition is due to the wound and sickness contracted in the Army.

He enlisted in Buffalo, July 18, 1862, and was discharged in June, 1865, in Richmond, Va.

Therefore he asks that his pension be increased to at least $50 per month by special act of Congress, so as to enable him to secure proper medical treatment and other necessaries of life for himself and aged wife.

RODERICK O'CONNOR,
149 Parkdale Ave., Buffalo, N. Y.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 29th day of June, 1914.
[SEAL.] THEODORE LORENTZ,
Notary Public.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 29, 1914.

I hereby certify that Mr. Roderick O'Connor, 149 Parkdale Avenue, Buffalo, N. Y., has been a patient under my care for the past two years; that he has been and is now suffering from necrosis of the nasal and turbinated bones, due to gunshot wound received 50 years ago. The bones were fractured and driven into each other in such a manner that their removal would be fatal.

These fractured bones have so obstructed the nasal passages and pressed upon adjacent tissues that the hearing has become very defective; the sense of smell and taste very much impaired. There is a constant discharge of irritating pus and mucus from the nostrils. He suffers from headache and general debility, loss of appetite, sleeplessness, and is very nervous. He is totally unfit to perform any mental or physical labor.

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that Mr. Roderick O'Connor, of 149 Parkdale Avenue, has been under my care on and off for the past 10 years, suffering from chronic cystitis; also rheumatism, especially lower limbs, with severe pains in head, affecting the eyesight and hearing, therefore rendering him unfit to follow his usual occupation.

Yours, respectfully,

H. E. LONG, M. D.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of July, 1914.

Notary Public.

Evidence of neighbors shows that soldier has no means and is dependent upon his pension for the support of himself and wife, and needs the care and attention of another person.

It is believed that soldier's condition is such that increase to $40 is warranted, his disabilities being partly of service origin; he is not totally helpless and no greater increase is warranted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 7597.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pension the following-named persons at the rates stated:

John H. Hopewell, late of Company A, Thirteenth Regiment United States Infantry, Regular Establishment, $12 per month.

William Bowen, late of Company H, Thirteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $17 per month.

Todd L. Wagoner, late of Company F, Twentieth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The SECRETARY. The committee reports at the end of the bill to insert the name of Thomas H. Jones, late of Company D,

Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The committee also proposes to insert the name of Etta Adair Anderson, widow of J. Patton Anderson, late lieutenant colonel Battalion Mississippi Rifles, War with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The committee also proposes to insert the name of Annie R. Chaffee, widow of Adna R. Chaffee, late lieutenant general (retired) United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $2,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD the following report of the committee.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 7629. Thomas H. Jones, of Farmington, N. Mex., served as private, artificer, and first sergeant in Company D, Third Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, in the War with Spain. The records of the War Department show that he enlisted April 28, 1898, and was honorably discharged January 31, 1899; also that he was treated in the service for pharyngitis, malarial fever, acute enteritis, constipation, and hepatic engorgement.

He applied for pension May 16, 1912 (No. 1403210), alleging that at Chickamauga Park, Ga., in July or August, 1898, he contracted typhoid fever, resulting in chronic bronchitis, chronic diarrhea, and nervous debility. The application was rejected in January, 1914, on the ground of no record or other satisfactory evidence to prove service origin and continuance from discharge of bronchitis, chronic diarrhea, and nervous debility and claimant's inability to furnish such evidence.

Upon his examination preliminary to discharge claimant stated to the discharging officers that he was suffering from weak lungs, incurred some two years previous in North Carolina. The captain certified that claimant was disabled by weak lungs, when, where, or how incurred not known. The surgeon certified that upon examination he found no disability.

The claim was investigated by special examiners of the Pension Bureau and testimony secured showing that soldier was in good bodily health before enlistment, free from lung trouble or other disability, and was sound and fit for service as a soldier. Two comrades testified to soldier's sickness in service, and there is testimony to the effect that his health has been impaired since discharge from diarrhea and bronchitis, which now incapacitate him for manual labor.

He was examined July 10, 1912, by a surgeon for the Pension Bureau, and the report is as follows:

"Applicant has chronic bronchitis, cough, and considerable expectoration, especially in morning. The sputum is rather thick, with yellowish tinge. He says he has had the cough and expectoration ever since he had the fever in summer of 1898. He understood at the time that he had typhoid fever and was placed in the typhoid ward. There is dullness and tenderness over lower lobe of right lung. Bowels move from four to six times daily, thin, with some mucus; some tenderness over bowels upon pressure. Throat is slightly sensitive, and there is huskiness of voice in the evenings. Liver is slightly enlarged. Spleen normal. Stomach in very good condition. Urinary organs all right. The nervous debility is caused from the bronchitis and chronic diarrhea, and, in my opinion, all these troubles are of tubercular origin. Heart is normal every way except its too rapid action, which I attribute to his tubercular condition.

"I have known applicant for three years, and from my personal acquaintance with him, as well as his present physical condition, will say that his disabilities are not due to nor aggravated by vicious habits. The rapid pulse and respiration, elevated temperature in afternoons, cough and expectoration, diarrhea, loss of flesh—all these applicant has at present and are unquestionable symptoms of tuberculosis."

Soldier is about 39 years of age. Medical and other evidence filed with the bill shows beyond question that he is in very poor health from pulmonary trouble and chronic diarrhea and is wholly incapacitated for the performance of manual labor; also that he is in poor financial circumstances, without property, and has a family dependent upon him for support.

Your committee incline to the opinion that the claim has merit, and so report the bill favorably with recommendation for pension at $20 per month.

S. 7180. Etta Adair Anderson, of Palatka, Fla., is the widow of J. Patton Anderson, late lieutenant colonel Battalion Mississippi Rifles, Mexican War, who served from October 30, 1847, to June 28, 1848, and who died September 20, 1872.

Mrs. Anderson, who is about 78 years of age, was married to the deceased officer April 30, 1853. She is now receiving a pension of $16 per month under special act approved May 17, 1902, and there is no general law under which she can obtain increase. She was originally pensioned at $8 per month (certificate No. 1064) under the Mexican War act of January 29, 1887, granting that rate of pension to all the widows of the soldiers of the Mexican War. The rate of $8 per month provided by the act of 1887 has since been increased to $12 per month by the act of April 19, 1908.

Medical evidence filed with the committee shows that Mrs. Anderson is crippled and helpless from fracture of hip and the infirmities of age, and is in such an enfeebled condition that she can do absolutely nothing toward earning a support, and requires the aid and care of other persons to look after her. She is also shown to be in very poor circumstances, having no property or source of income aside from her pension.

There are many precedents for increasing the pensions of the aged and destitute widows of the soldiers of the Mexican War, and the foregoing facts bring this case fully within such precedents. The bill is reported favorably, with recommendation for increase of pension to $20 per month.

S. 6697. Annie R. Chaffee is the widow of the late Lieut. Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, United States Army.

Gen. Chaffee was born in Ohio in April, 1842, and entered the Army July 22, 1861, as a private in the Sixth United States Regular Cavalry. Two years later, in May, 1863, he was commissioned second lieutenant, becoming a first lieutenant in February, 1865. In October, 1867, he was made captain, and following this was successively promoted through the several grades to the rank of lieutenant general of the Army, to which he was commissioned from January 9, 1904.

Gen. Chaffee had a brilliant career, serving in the Civil War, Indian campaigns, the Spanish War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Chinese Boxer uprising. At El Caney, Cuba, he, having been given command of a brigade, opened the fight, and his men bore the brunt of it throughout the day. In 1900, when fighting began in China, he was selected to command the American forces. After his service in China he was given command of the Philippine forces.

On his return to this country Gen. Chaffee was appointed Chief of Staff, and served in that capacity until 1906. He was in active service continuously until February 1, 1906, when he was placed on the retired list. He served his country faithfully and honorably in the Regular Army for nearly 45 years. We annex a statement of the service of the officer as furnished from the records of the War Department.

Gen. Chaffee died at Los Angeles, Cal., November 1, 1914, of typhoid-pneumonia. As his fatal disease was not contracted during his active service, the Pension Bureau is powerless to grant his widow adequate relief. The only pension she can obtain there is the small sum of $12 per month provided by the act of April 19, 1908, for the widow of an officer or enlisted man who served 90 days in the Civil War.

Mrs. Chaffee married the deceased officer March 31, 1875, is now well advanced in years, and in necessitous circumstances. She has no income from any source.

In view of the long, brilliant, and highly useful service of Gen. Chaffee, the rank he held at the time of his death, and the other facts shown by the evidence, we recommend his widow be paid a pension of $2,000 per year. This is the same amount as that accorded the widows of Gens. McClellan, Hancock, Crook, and Thomas. Mrs. Sheridan received $2,500, and Mrs. Logan, the widow of a Volunteer officer, receives $2,000. There is little likelihood that the case of Mrs. Chaffee will in itself become a precedent. Gen. Chaffee was the last lieutenant general. With his death the rank of lieutenant general dies. It could be revived only by affirmative action of Congress.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 22, 1914.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 19th instant for a statement of the military service of the late Lieut. Gen. Adna R. Very truly, yours,

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield further to take up the House pension bills. I only wished at this time to call up the Senate bills that had been reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions.

HUNTON ALLEN.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 17424, for the relief of Hunton Allen. It is a bill which is designed to reimburse a postmaster for a loss caused by burglary.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I shall object to any other bills being acted upon or called up from the calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Hunton Allen, the postmaster at Williamson, in the State of Georgia, with the sum of $237.16, the amount and value of postage stamps stolen from said post office by a burglar on May 13, 1913, without any fault on the part of said Allen; and said amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a brief communication which I have received concerning the subject of international arbitration.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a very able communication from a gentleman relative to propositions of peace and of international arbitration. It is a very learned document and one that I think will be read with a great deal of interest.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Who is the author?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Oscar T. Crosby, of Warrenton, Va. I do not ask to have it read, but that it be made a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator agree to have it go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am afraid I will not get it out. It is not a long communication.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator ought to take his chances about getting it out. If it is all right, I think the committee will report it out, and I would rather have it go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the paper as a document?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let it go to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, before unanimous consent is given, I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether that provision in the House bill which proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the investigation of the so-called cucumber disease is to be restored in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. The committee amendment referred to is on page 18, and upon information received since the committee acted on the subject my judgment is that the amount ought to be restored. When we reach that point I will, if the occasion requires, state my reasons for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, if I understand the Senator, he is perfectly willing that the appropriation shall be restored by which the department is directed to investigate the cucumber disease?

Mr. GORE. Yes; as far as I am concerned I think the appropriation ought to be restored.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if it is a disease of cucumbers or a disease created by the use of cucumbers?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is aimed at the cucumber disease. It occasioned the loss of something like $2,000,000 in the State of Michigan alone last year, and it becomes very important to our people that it should be investigated. With the assurance of the Senator from Oklahoma that the appropriation of $5,000 will be restored I have no objection to the request he has made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the bill will be read for amendment and the committee amendments will be first considered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment was, on page 3, line 12, to strike out "2 watchmen, at $840 each; 42," and insert "44," so as to read:

Forty-four watchmen, at $720 each.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have a few remarks that I wish to make upon this bill, and they may as well be made in reference to this amendment as at any other time. I will discuss what I have to say upon the entire bill in the consideration of this particular amendment.

Mr. President, at the present time, when our minds are filled with the developments of the great war in Europe, it is the part of wisdom for all of our people to give serious consideration to the real and lasting effects of this war upon our own country and its future prospects. I do not mean consideration of the possibility of our Nation becoming involved in the unfortunate struggle. Such a possibility, I believe, is rather remote, and that nothing short of a gross blunder on our part would involve us in that conflict. No belligerent will court trouble with this country. But the serious consideration which I would invoke is of the great economic effects of the war upon our people. These economic effects are now accomplishing a number of things worthy of note, and the things they will accomplish in the future deserve even more attention.

THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF AND THE INDUSTRIAL DEPRESSION.

Long before the war broke out a great industrial depression had settled upon our country as a result of the extreme low-tariff legislation insisted upon by the Democratic administration and enacted in the fall of 1913. After this tariff went into effect our imports increased and our exports actually decreased. As this Democratic tariff had included as one of its especial objects the placing of practically all farm products on the free list, its enactment was followed by a great increase in the importation of foreign farm products. Such products came flowing into our American markets from all over the world. From the most remote countries, as well as from the nearest countries, from Australia, China, and Siberia, as well as from Canada and South America, the products of cheaper lands and cheaper labor came freely and abundantly into our American markets, to the consequent displacement or depreciation of the products of the American farmers, obtained from their more costly lands by the more highly paid labor, which is a necessity of their higher standard of living.

It might be well right here, Mr. President, to give a few of the increases in the importation of agricultural products. It will be remembered that the law went into effect on October 4, 1913. I have not the figures here for the particular months preceding and the particular months succeeding, but only for the years, and I would especially call attention to the great increase in the year after the enactment of this law as compared with the year previous.

Imports of agricultural products for 12 months ending Dec. 31, 1912, 1913, and 1914.

Cattle	$5,296,296	$14,692,916	$19,650,903

For instance, in 1912 the value of all the cattle imported into the United States was $5,296,296. In 1913, with only a few months of this tariff law, it increased to $14,692,916; in 1914 it increased to $19,650,903.

The importations of sheep in 1912 were valued at $89,288; in 1914 at $657,388.

Of all other animals, including fowls, and excepting horses, which remained about stationary, in 1912 we imported $657,135 worth; in 1914 we imported $4,495,785 worth.

Of corn, in 1912 we imported $505,896 worth, and in 1914 $9,676,050 worth. Most of it came from Argentina.

Oats increased from $6,000,000 in 1912, in round numbers, to nearly $10,000,000 in 1913 and nearly $8,000,000 in 1914. It would have been very much more in 1914, except for the great European demand during all the period in which the crop was marketed in the fall of 1914, and also except for the failure of the oats crop in Canada.

Now, coming to beef and veal, I especially call the attention of Senators to the fact that in 1913 we imported, in value, $2,828,058 worth. In 1914 that $2,828,058 grew to $22,758,994, or ten times the amount.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I do not disturb the Senator, I should like to know to what he attributes that large increase?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is only one cause. We put beef and other meats on the free list.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator know whether these large importations have affected the prices to the consumer?

Mr. McCUMBER. I know they have not affected the prices at all. I will touch upon that a little later.

Again, we imported mutton and lamb in 1913 of the value of only $46,931, but in 1914 the importations grew to $1,824,160. Remember that every dollar's worth displaced a dollar's worth of the product of the American farmer.

Taking pork, I especially call your attention to the fact that in 1913 we imported pork of the value of only $36,726, but in 1914 that $36,726 grew to an importation amounting to $2,342,721.

Let us take the little article of cream. In 1912 we imported $895,000 worth, in round numbers; but in 1914 we imported $1,945,497 worth.

Of milk, in 1912, we imported—and I call especial attention to this—only $88,429 worth; but in 1914 that $88,429 grew to an importation of $2,283,084 worth.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I wish to ask, can he tell us where this milk was imported from?

Mr. McCUMBER. It was mostly imported from Canada.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And without a tariff?

Mr. McCUMBER. Without a tariff. We got nothing out of it at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. The cream also came from Canada.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true; and the New York farmer felt the effect of it, although the consumer in New York did not get his cream any cheaper.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator whether or not there is any reciprocal arrangement between Canada and the United States affecting the duty on milk?

Mr. McCUMBER. None at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And we are obliged to pay the tariff in the customhouse in Canada to get milk and cream into Canada?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not remember what the tariff is to take those articles over across into Canada; but we do not export any over there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We do not export any.

Mr. McCUMBER. But they can send theirs here absolutely free.

Now, let us take butter. In 1912 we imported butter of the value of $235,604, but in 1914 that grew to $1,670,522.

Our wool importations from 1913 to 1914 increased from $28,000,000 to over $58,000,000.

Those are but a few of the products which show an enormous increase under the Democratic tariff.

THE AMERICAN FARMERS' HOME MARKET SACRIFICED.

Mr. President, Democratic legislation had done all that legislation could well do to deprive the American farmers of the American markets. But notwithstanding this severe treatment of our farmers, which the Democratic Party had declared to be necessary for the welfare of the consumers of food products in the cities, these consumers were found to be in no way benefited. The cost of living in the cities was not reduced. It seemed that all that was lost by the farmers was caught up by middlemen and speculators or had in some way disappeared in the course of the distribution of farm products. The Democratic leaders were forced, much to their disgust and humiliation, to admit finally that the cost of living had not been reduced and could scarcely be expected to be reduced as a consequence of the Democratic tariff.

Mr. President, the whole Democratic campaign of 1912 against the then existing Republican tariff as the principal cause of the high cost of living was unfair to the people and untrue to the facts. The higher range of prices, which made up what was called the high cost of living, affected practically all commodities, whether protected or unprotected, and was a notable phenomenon the world over. It was regarded and was being studied by the best economists as a remarkable situation, which was common to the entire world; and it was recognized by them that the remedy, if one could be found, would have to be applied by all the great nations acting in harmony on this subject, as the trouble was world-wide; and it was freely admitted by the leading economists studying this subject that no one nation could alone accomplish anything to lower the high level of prices.

THE INTERNATIONAL HIGH LEVEL OF PRICES AND ITS APPARENT CAUSE.

Prior to the presidential campaign of 1912, Mr. President, the then Republican administration had given attention to this international phenomenon of high prices and had dealt with it in the only honest and fair way—by urging the establishment of an international commission to determine the causes and, if possible, the remedies, and to recommend the prompt adoption of the required remedies by the various nations. This was known to be the only way by which genuine relief could be obtained. In our country the Republican administration was known to be ready to act at the earliest possible moment to apply the true remedy, but would not attempt to mislead the people with a false remedy or engage in a dangerous adventure for the lack of a remedy.

The prevailing opinion among the best economists who have made a special study of the world-wide high prices is that this feature is a necessary result of the recent extraordinary increase in the world's production of gold. As they point out, gold is the one common measure of value all over the world. All other commodities are exchangeable for gold everywhere, and hence their values are reckoned in terms of gold. Through new discoveries and improved processes of mining, the output of gold throughout the world has increased enormously during the past 15 or 20 years, far more in proportion than the output of the other commodities. Hence a fixed quantity of gold, like a dollar, will exchange for a smaller quantity of the other commodities. And hence a fixed quantity of a certain commodity, like a barrel of flour, will exchange for a larger number of dollars. This is equivalent to saying that the prices of the other commodities are greater than before, because of this universal factor of the gold supply. Of course, the price of gold is what it will exchange for in other commodities, and it would be impossible to note the falling price or depreciation of gold, due to its greater abundance, otherwise than in the rising prices of the other commodities.

Mr. President, I think it quite proper here to insert in the RECORD a table showing the production of gold year by year since the discovery of America, and I ask that it may be inserted here and made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. I would simply call attention to the fact that from 1545 to 1560 the world produced only $90,492,000 worth of gold, whereas in 1907 the production had grown to $412,000,000 in a single year, and has since that time been above the $400,000,000 basis every year.

THE DEMOCRATIC POLICY MISLEADING.

Now, whether or not this increased gold supply be the one fundamental cause of the world's high prices, as is claimed, the proposition is at least a reasonable one and deserves thorough attention, for the subject is of the greatest importance. This gold-supply theory recognizes that the cause or causes of the high level of prices must be some world-wide factor. This theory was advanced long before 1912 as the scientific explanation of the high cost of living throughout the world, and the able men who have written most about it in the United States are both Republicans and Democrats. Nevertheless, the Democratic leaders in the campaign of 1912 and in the Democratic administration now in power persisted in misleading the people on this subject as long as they could possibly do so, and kept maintaining that the Republican protective tariff was the great cause of the high cost of living, and that the Democratic tariff which they proposed and subsequently enacted would be the remedy, and they kept up this farce until their Democratic tariff had been in effect for many months without any reduction in the cost of living being accomplished. Then came the end of this comedy and the open admission of the failure of the Democratic tariff to accomplish this or any other useful result; and this was the situation before the war was in prospect.

THE IMPORTANCE OF GREATER DOMESTIC PRODUCTION.

Mr. President, there is, in my judgment, much to commend the gold-supply theory of high prices. It is in line with sound reason and common knowledge. It is practically a statement that the production of gold has outrun the production of the other commodities. This being so, the obvious remedy for the situation is either to diminish the production of gold, which is apparently impracticable, or to increase the production of the other commodities, which is entirely practicable and is, in fact, actually going on. I have frequently called attention to the great increase in recent years throughout the world of farm products, which form so large a proportion of all the commodities traded in, and I have repeatedly referred to the vast undeveloped agricultural resources of the United States, which would be developed and yield a great additional output of foodstuffs if the American farmers could obtain a proper return for their labor and investment. Such return they could and would obtain if the American markets were given to the American farmers for a term of years, as of right they ought to be. The actual production of the great additional output of American farm products which is at our command is simply a matter of meeting the necessary labor cost under our American standard of living.

OUR UNDEVELOPED AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

Our undeveloped resources in this country, for agriculture and other industries as well, are quite thoroughly known and have been often commented on. The United States Department of Agriculture, under Democratic as well as under Republican management, has called attention to the need of greater and better production from our own soil. The present Secretary of Agriculture, a Democrat, said in a recent annual report that according to his estimate less than 40 per cent of our total arable land is reasonably well cultivated, and that less than 12 per cent is yielding fairly full returns.

Mr. President, the present lack of proper agricultural development is by no means limited to the Western States. It is well known that in my own State, North Dakota, less than 30 per cent of the prairie soil has yet been cultivated, and that in Montana there is a vast area waiting for agricultural development. Not only does a similar situation prevail in most of the States of the West, but also in the older States of the East there is disclosed a want of the normal use and development of fertile lands. The commissioner of agriculture in the State of Maine said in a recent report:

> There are thousands of acres of land located near our cities and yielding only light crops that might be made to produce abundant and profitable harvests of fruits, vegetables, grains, and potatoes.

Prof. Liberty H. Bailey, former director of the New York State College of Agriculture, and a great authority on agricultural affairs, has said:

> Speaking broadly, we are now in the rough and crude stage of our agricultural development, but the situation will develop only as it pays and satisfies persons to live in the country. * * * New York is undeveloped agriculturally. The same is true of New England and Pennsylvania and the great regions southward.

THE NEW WEALTH THAT COMES FROM OUR AGRICULTURE.

Mr. President, as agriculture is our basic industry, every addition to its product is an entirely new creation of wealth which flows on throughout the country and increases the production from other industries. Notwithstanding this great truth, and notwithstanding the abundant evidences of our great resources calling for development, the Democratic Party insisted on applying the policy of free trade in farm products and thus freely opening our American markets to such products from everywhere, to the disadvantage of our own farmers and the discouragement of our own agricultural production. The Democratic tariff law enforcing this policy went into effect on October 4, 1913. It had therefore been in effect just about 10 months before the great war began. Our experience during these 10 months illustrates clearly the effect of this policy. Of course, as soon as the war began the situation as to our imports and exports was at once entirely changed as a result of war conditions, so that the statistics of our imports of farm products or other imports during and after August, 1914, do not show the effect of the tariff law of this country but merely the effect of the industrial and trade disturbances in Europe arising from the abnormal condition of war.

THE GREAT IMPORTATIONS UNDER THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF.

It is important for us, Mr. President, to have a clear idea of the character and extent of the importations of foreign farm products from the enactment of the Democratic tariff to the outbreak of the war in order to understand the conditions imposed by the Democratic policy on our farmers. Under these conditions our fundamental industry of farming was suffering with growing intensity when the war began, and from them this industry will again suffer when the war is over and until this Democratic tariff is repealed, with additional burdens of disadvantage resulting from the war, and to which I shall briefly refer. We can readily obtain an idea of these conditions by comparing the importations of some representative farm products under the 10 months of the Democratic tariff before the war with the importations of these products during the corresponding 10 months one year prior to that time under the former Republican tariff.

CORN.

The Republican tariff maintained a duty of 15 cents per bushel on this great American product. The existing Democratic tariff wiped out this duty entirely and placed corn on the free list. From that time until the beginning of the war corn was brought into our country in enormous quantities from Argentina and other distant countries. During the 10 months from October, 1912, to July, 1913, inclusive, under the then existing Republican tariff, the importations of corn were only 286,000 bushels, valued at $162,000. During the corresponding 10 months one year later, under the present Democratic tariff, corn was imported to the vast total of 13,600,000 bushels, valued at $8,700,000. Not one cent of revenue was paid to our Government by these greatly increased imports, which were thus encouraged to take the place of American corn in our markets.

Mr. President, the rate at which these imports were increasing when the war broke out indicates that when peace comes again there will be scarcely any limit to the importations of foreign corn. This crop is produced in vast and increasing quantities in Argentina from the cheapest lands and by the cheapest labor. Almost all of the corn crop in that country is exported, and, of course, while the American market is freely open to it every encouragement is thus given to increase the acreage devoted to it in the great area there available, and also to increase the yield per acre. Before the war began new arrangements were on the point of being made for additional ships to carry grain from Argentina to this country. Moreover, great preparations were also being made at that time in Russia for sending to this country great quantities of grain, with especial assistance in this matter from the Russian Government. And there were evidences of growing developments in other distant parts of the world, as well as in nearer places, of plans for increased production of grain for shipment to the American market.

OATS.

Under the former Republican tariff there was a duty of 15 cents per bushel on oats. The Democratic tariff cut down this duty to only 6 cents per bushel, which was a reduction of 60 per cent. During the 10 months from October, 1912, to July, 1913, inclusive, under the Republican tariff there were imported only 80,000 bushels, valued at $38,000. I am giving these figures all in round numbers. But in the corresponding 10 months, 1 year later, from October, 1913, to July, 1914, inclusive, under the Democratic tariff the imports of oats amounted to the great quantity of 22,500,000 bushels, valued at nearly $8,000,000. When the war broke out northwestern Canada, with its great production of oats, was just beginning to take advantage of the opportunities given to them under our Democratic tariff in the American market. Of course, the war has interrupted the Canadian and other imports, but it is certain that as soon as the war is over the great increase in the imports of oats will again prevail unless our protective tariff shall have been restored in the meantime.

POTATOES.

On potatoes the Republican rate of duty was 25 cents per bushel. The Democratic tariff has cut down the rate to only 10 per cent ad valorem, with a provision that no duty at all is imposed on potatoes imported from countries which impose no duty on potatoes from the United States. In this respect the situation as to potatoes in the present tariff is the same as that of wheat, and with potatoes as with wheat we have not yet begun to feel the full effects of what is practically equivalent to free trade in these products, and did not experience the full force of the tariff change even before the war began. There have been, however, very considerable importations of potatoes under the Democratic tariff. During the 10 months of this tariff prior to the outbreak of the war not less than 3,630,000 bushels were imported, valued at $1,752,000, most of this quantity paying no duty. The extent of the increase in such imports can be judged by noting that in the corresponding 10 months 1 year before, under the Republican tariff, only 314,000 bushels were imported, valued at $283,000. This great increase in actual imports took place in spite of the fact that great quantities of intended imports were held back by the quarantine which the Agricultural Department found it necessary to enforce against foreign potato diseases. When the war is over and this quarantine has been lifted it will be found that there are many millions of bushels of foreign-grown potatoes ready to be dumped into the American markets.

EGGS.

Mr. President, under the former Republican tariff eggs were kept dutiable at 5 cents per dozen. The Democratic tariff placed eggs on the free list. During the 10 months from the enactment of this tariff to the outbreak of the war 6,000,000 dozens of eggs were brought into our country, the increase being five times the imports during the corresponding period one year before under the Republican tariff. Many thousands of dozens of these foreign eggs came from China, where farm laborers work for a wage equivalent to about 40 cents a week. The Chinese have the art of preserving eggs, and with these, as with other farm products, the modern refrigerating systems which have been installed in ships to a great extent make it easy to carry such products over vast distances. The opening of the Panama Canal encourages the bringing to our shores of eggs and other products from China, Japan, and other parts of Asia. In December last a ship reached New York from China, after passing through the Panama Canal, with a great cargo of frozen Chinese eggs in her refrigerators. Because of the unusual demand in Europe, incident to the war, this cargo was sent on there for consumption by the armies in the field. When the war is over such cargoes will remain for consumption in this country. In fact, notwithstanding the war, a cargo of 60 tons, or 90,000 dozen, Chinese eggs was landed at San Francisco about the middle of February, one of the largest shipments of this kind ever received at that port.

DAIRY PRODUCTS.

On dairy products, also, the Democratic tariff has cut down duties severely where it did not completely establish free trade. Butter, which was dutiable at 6 cents per pound under the Republican tariff, has been reduced to only 2½ cents per pound under the Democratic tariff. This is a reduction of almost 60 per cent. The result is that our butter market has been thrown open to Canada, Argentina, Siberia, and other butter-producing countries. From October, 1912, to July, 1913, inclusive, under the Republican tariff, the imports of butter amounted to only 1,000,000 pounds, valued at about $272,000; but in the corresponding 10 months one year later, under the Democratic tariff, the imports amounted to the substantial total of 7,685,000 pounds, valued at $1,700,000. Then the war began and stopped importations to a great extent. The duty on cheese was reduced from 6 cents per pound to 20 per cent ad valorem, a reduction of about 40 per cent, and during the 10 months above mentioned the increase in the imports was no less than 12,500,000 pounds, and the prospect of further increase was interrupted only by the war.

Mr. President, cream was placed on the free list by the Democratic tariff, sacrificing the Republican duty of 5 cents per gallon. The importations before the war under this free trade increased by 482,000 gallons. Milk, both fresh and condensed, was also made absolutely free of duty by the Democratic Party. The imports increased enormously. From October, 1912, to July, 1913, under the Republican rates, the importations of fresh and condensed milk were valued at $134,000. During the corresponding 10 months under the Democratic tariff before the war such importations amounted to $1,264,000. New arrangements for the importation of great quantities of condensed milk scarcely had been under way when the war broke out, but already our American dairymen had been obliged to sell their milk at lower prices to our condensed-milk manufacturers because of this foreign competition. Moreover, fresh milk was being sent from Canada into certain parts of the United States in tank cars. When the war is over, such great importations of dairy products will be resumed in their former and in increasing force.

LIMITED ADVANTAGE TO OUR FARMERS FROM THE WAR.

Mr. President, this present war, as it surpasses every former one in the number of nations and the millions of men engaged, has brought a greater disturbance than ever before in the normal trade of the neutral nations. The demand in Europe for wheat and other foodstuffs has been altogether unprecedented. This situation, combined with the bottling up of the great exportable surplus of wheat in Russia, has brought such a demand for wheat from our continent as to raise the price to figures which must, of course, be very gratifying to American farmers. The vast surplus of wheat in Canada is being drawn almost entirely to Europe, and since the war began has not pressed upon the American market as formerly. The war has, in fact, given to the American farmers a temporary but none the less substantial command of the American market for farm products, and, in addition, an extraordinary market abroad.

But the American farmers can take no great satisfaction in these conditions, notwithstanding that they find some unexpected profit in them. They find that these unforeseen war conditions overcome to a great extent the damaging results to them of the Democratic tariff. This is satisfactory, of course, as far as it goes. But it is no satisfaction to reflect that such temporary and partial relief from an ill-advised tariff is merely an incidental result of the death and destruction inflicted in Europe and elsewhere by the contending armies and navies. Our American farmers can not do otherwise than regard the whole conflict with abhorrence and dismay whatever its results.

As a matter of fact, any advantage that may be accruing to our farmers, because of the war prices of foodstuffs, is likely to be greatly overestimated. A great deal of our wheat, corn, and other products was sold by the farmers before the war was in prospect and at prices depressed at the farm through the actual or expected importations of foreign supplies under the Democratic free-trade tariff. And since the war prices came it will be found that the greatest advantage therefrom has gone to the speculators and middlemen, as is usually the case.

Mr. President, it was only the other day that a large farmer from my State was visiting me, and stated that he was on the point of contracting all of his grain at 60 cents a bushel just prior to the outbreak of the war. When that war suddenly came upon the world he felt certain that it would be better for him to keep it, and he sold it but a short time ago for $1.30 a bushel, or more than double what he was willing to take for it just a few days prior to the outbreak of the war.

It is exceptionally difficult for farmers to accumulate such resources as to enable them to hold back their products and wait for improved market conditions, and the very character of their products makes it impossible to do this to any great extent, for the products of agriculture are in general more perishable than those of any other industry.

And while the prices of wheat and other grains have been high because of the abnormal demands of war, the prices of certain other important products have remained low because the war demand has not affected them enough to overcome the effects of the great industrial and commercial depression from which we have been suffering since the Democratic tariff was inflicted on the country. For example, the prices of hogs and of pork have been and remain so low as to bring discouragement to the producers of these necessary articles. This is apparently because of the falling off in our domestic consumption, which is one of the results of the widespread and persistent depression.

Mr. President, I was asking a gentleman who is thoroughly acquainted with the pork and hog market how he accounted for the fact that while beef during the war has increased in value, the hog product had gone down. His reply was somewhat new to me. He stated that the hog product is consumed almost wholly at home; that it is the laborer's meat in the United States; that owing to the depression and the consequent decrease in the consumption of pork by the laborers in the United States, and because of the fact that pork is not used in the armies to any great extent, as they desire beef and mutton and that kind of meat rather than pork, it had depressed rather than raised the price of pork.

GREATER PRODUCTION THE WORLD OVER CAUSED BY THE WAR.

The present war demands of Europe, however, are having a tremendous effect in stimulating a much greater production of wheat and other foodstuffs all over the world. The immediate needs of the warring nations and the prices now being paid are causing all the agricultural countries not engaged in the war to devote all possible energies and resources to the production of the greatest possible supplies of such products. In the United States our wheat crop of 1914 was an enormous one, the greatest in the history of the country. The same was true of the rye crop. The crops of corn, oats, and barley were greater than in any previous year except 1912. With these banner crops to be disposed of by our farmers, and with the great importations of foreign foodstuffs coming into our markets under the Democratic policy of free trade in farm products, the outlook for prices at the farms was not an encouraging one from the standpoint of the farmers prior to the outbreak of the war. But the war has entirely changed this situation, and the farmers who were able to hold their crops, or part of them, until the war began have reaped a substantial reward. And so powerful is the stimulating effect of the war on grain production that an exceptionally large crop of winter wheat has been planted, and its condition is so good that if nothing unforeseen happens, our harvest of winter wheat in 1915 will exceed that of last year, and an even greater planting of spring wheat is in prospect.

A similar increase in production is known to be developing in Canada, in South America, Australia, and other countries, and because of the great areas of available and cheaper land in these places the increase in grain production from these newer countries is bound to run to much larger quantities than the increase in the United States. It is true that in the cotton-growing States of our country there will be thousands of acres diverted from cotton to corn or wheat because of the low and unprofitable price to which cotton fell under war conditions, while these same conditions were bringing high and very profitable prices for the grains. But a study of the increased production that already has been accomplished in the great wheat-producing countries of the world indicates that the foreign countries referred to have much greater undeveloped resources for such production than exists in the United States, although it has been demonstrated that in the United States the agricultural possibilities are such as to enable us to raise here all the food we shall need to supply eight times the present population, or 800,000,000 people.

Mr. President, the extent of the recent and continuing development of grain production in a number of the less advanced foreign countries is not clearly understood by many of our people. The period from 1900 to 1912 was one of great development in the United States in agriculture as well as in manufactures. During this period our wheat production increased 39 per cent. But the production of wheat in Russia increased in the same time 59 per cent. In Argentina it increased 63 per cent. In the wheat-raising Provinces of Canada west of the Great Lakes it increased 725 per cent. Canadian statisticians report that western Canada alone can raise enough wheat to feed the whole world to-day. From 1900 to 1912 the production of oats in the United States increased 75 per cent. But in Canada west of the Great Lakes such production increased 262 per cent, and in Argentina as much as 2,952 per cent; and in other foodstuffs there has been a similar increase in production.

THE BETTER UTILIZATION OF GREAT RESOURCES.

Mr. President, now what the war is accomplishing in practically all the great producing countries of the world is a sudden and extraordinary increase in their already great production of foodstuffs. It brings a greater acreage into use and promotes a greater yield per acre. In the great areas of these countries the war does not interrupt but incites production. It is true that Russia is involved in the war and that millions of her men have been called from the fields to the front. But very little of Russia's territory can be invaded, and her population is so great and the women and older men there so much accustomed to farm labor that it is very likely to be true, as reported, that her next crops will not be appreciably diminished by the war. Moreover, the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of vodka and other alcoholic liquors in Russia must have the effect of adding to the available food supply millions of bushels of grain which were formerly turned into alcohol.

Instead of the demoralization and waste which always attend the drinking of alcohol and which have greatly injured and impoverished the Russian peasants, there are now to be found the greater strength and efficiency and the increased savings and resources that attend the practice of strict sobriety. It is reported from Russia that the productive efficiency of the Russian peasants has increased 50 per cent since prohibition was put into effect. As to Australia, although a part of the British Empire, the productiveness of this great country is not affected by the war otherwise than to be aroused to greater results.

The impetus which is thus given by the war to the increased production of foodstuffs in the great countries outside of the areas of battle is bound to continue in force to a great extent after the war is over. In making new efforts it is the first step which costs. Thereafter it is comparatively easy to keep on. It is generally believed that the great conflict can not possibly last more than 12 months longer, and there are good reasons for expecting a much earlier termination. And when the longed-for end of the horror comes, when the last shot has been fired and the whole of the shocking calamity has passed into history, it will be found that from the loss and misery of Europe there remains a force driving on a greater agricultural production.

GREATER AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION TO COME FROM THE COUNTRIES NOW AT WAR.

Mr. President, when we consider the economic conditions that will prevail within the countries in Europe which have been involved in the struggle, we are bound to see another and a very interesting advance in the development of agriculture. When peace has come to the warring nations it will find almost all of them practically or entirely bankrupt. Whether or not there may be a fiscal bankruptcy of the national treasuries, which does not necessarily follow, there is the widespread collapse and ruin of private enterprises in all the fields of industry. In Germany, Austria-Hungary, Poland, Belgium, and a large part of France manufacturing and trading businesses have been swept away. The capital accumulations of many years have been lost. Over a great area factories, mills, and establishments of all sorts, with their valuable machinery and equipment, have been actually destroyed.

When peace has been restored the brave people who remain on earth amid all this suffering and loss will, of course, go to work with greater energy than before to repair their shattered fortunes and to build up profitable trade anew. They will have to begin all over again. Their Governments will help them in every way possible. They must begin at the beginning to produce wealth again. Where and how shall they begin? They will have to make their great effort in their building-up process through the one industry which has not been and can not be destroyed. This is the fundamental industry of agriculture. Buildings and manufacturing equipment have been destroyed, but no land has been destroyed. All the land remains, and is at once ready to be put to use, no less fertile than before.

Mr. President, there has been very little, if any, interruption of agricultural production within the borders of any of the warring nations. On the other hand, there is now going on a forced production of every possible increase. It is known that the Germans, under the pressure of the keenest necessity for more foodstuffs, are, with their characteristic thoroughness, about to apply the most energetic efforts, aided by the best skill and science, to every available plat of ground in their territory. And it is reported that in Austria-Hungary the Government has issued orders that every available bit of ground be sown with wheat, and that not a single plat of ground anywhere be left uncultivated. It is not only in wheat that the effects of such new efforts will be felt. Corn is being produced in Europe in steadily increasing quantities. All the grains will be produced more abundantly.

All the nations which have suffered so much from the war know very well that it is by working up a great agricultural production, with a great surplus for export wherever possible, that they will be able to obtain, after the conclusion of the war, through the sale of such surplus, the capital urgently needed for the rehabilitation of the other industries. Their agriculture, therefore, the basic industry and the original source of wealth, will be developed and driven to the utmost yield. From this source they must commence to build up again their credit balances with other nations, and the output of their manufacturing industries, and all the superstructure of trade and commerce which helps to advance their progress. For these reasons all the war-time efforts for greater agricultural production will be continued and intensified in time of peace. They will not be buyers of foodstuffs to the extent they formerly were. They will be sellers to a greater extent than ever before. Their economic necessities will drive them in this direction, and their own domestic consumption will be less than before through the loss in war of millions of lives and increased poverty throughout the land.

THE ONLY WAY OF RELIEF FOR AMERICAN FARMERS.

Under these conditions, confronting these economic effects of the war, what will be the position of the American farmers after the close of that war? They will have a greater production of farm products to dispose of, and all the other countries will be similarly situated. Surplus farm products from everywhere will be seeking a market, and such products will be sent to the United States in quantities greater than ever before. Under the Democratic policy of free trade in such products, as long as this policy continues, they will be entering our markets easily and freely. Our own farmers will have no advantage in our markets as against these foreign products and will have to stand by and see their own American products displaced or depreciated by the imported ones. They will have to see their own production discouraged thereby and further development of our American soil retarded.

The meager tariff on wheat and foodstuffs depending upon Canadian duties, which may be removed at any time, the product will enter the country far more freely, and we therefore probably will see Canada and other countries taking advantage of the provision in the Democratic tariff whereby wheat and potatoes will be admitted free of duty into our country from countries which impose no duty on like products from this country. With a great increased production of wheat in Canada and with lessened opportunities for export to Europe because of increased production of grains there and greater supplies going there from South America, our great neighbor on the north, whose extensive lands adjoin our market, will feel the need of every possible advantage in getting her wheat into their nearest market, the United States. Canada consumes only about one-quarter of the wheat she produces. She has, therefore, nothing whatever to lose by removing her duty on wheat from the United States. The imports to Canada from the United States would be inconsiderable, but Canadian wheat would obtain the great benefit of free entry into this country, with its higher priced lands and its far greater consumption of food products.

If the American farmers wish to have a reasonable advantage in the American market, so that they may maintain and advance their industry in the face of the conditions throughout the world, which I have referred to, they will find it necessary to demand the repeal of the Democratic tariff and a return to the protective policy of the Republican Party, under which they were rapidly traveling toward the goal of assured and lasting prosperity.

So, Mr. President, if in this Agricultural appropriation bill there is a real desire to benefit the American farmer, the very first thing to do, and the only thing to do, will be to reinstate the old protection which he had prior to October 4, 1913. He does not need that protection probably during the continuance of the present war, but as soon as it is over, unless that tariff law is repealed, we shall have the greatest agricultural depression in this country it has ever known since the early nineties.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to have some explanation at some time of that item in the bill, and especially of that part of it which is to be diverted to a purpose for which this appropriation has not previously been used. I should like to know what the condition of the attempt to eradicate the cattle ticks has reached. Is progress being made? Every year I note that more money is being provided for that purpose. Now, it seems that an attempt is being made to use some part of the appropriation for another purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This item reads:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $498,800.

I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the chairman of the committee is temporarily absent, and I wish the Senator would withhold his question until he comes in, if the matter may be passed over until that time.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask that the amendment may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the item will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 13, line 21, after the word "products," to strike out "$85,940" and insert "$98,580," so as to make the clause read:

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $98,580.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 2, after the word "dourine," to strike out "$235,000" and insert "$375,000," so as to read:

For all necessary expenses for the investigation, treatment, and eradication of hog cholera and dourine, $375,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 21, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$1,816,706" and insert "$2,069,346."

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $2,797,976.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Plant Industry," in the item of appropriation for "Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 15, line 20, before the word "clerks," to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "forty-seven," so as to read:

Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry: One physiologist and pathologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $3,000; 1 executive assistant in seed djstribution, $2,500; 1 officer in charge of publications, $2,250; 1 landscape gardener, $1,800; 1 officer in charge of records, $2,250; 1 superintendent of seed weighing and mailing, $2,000; 1 executive clerk, $2,250; 3 executive clerks, at $1,980 each; 1 assistant superintendent of seed warehouse, $1,400; 1 seed inspector, $1,000; 1 seed warehouseman, $1,400; 1 seed warehouseman, $1,020; 1 seed warehouseman, $1,000; one seed warehouseman, $840; 6 clerks, class 4; 12 clerks, class 3; 2 clerks, at $1,500 each; 21 clerks, class 2; 47 clerks.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 16, line 3, after "$1,620," to strike out "one clerk or artist" and insert "two clerks or artists, at," so as to read:

Twenty-six messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 artist, $1,620; 2 clerks or artists, at $1,200.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that, if that amendment providing for 2 clerks or artists at $1,200 should be agreed to, there should be inserted after the numerals "$1,200" the word "each."

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is right; the word "each" should be inserted, and I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary states to the Chair that that amendment has been corrected by the committee in the copy which is being used at the desk. The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, in lines 3 and 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "one clerk or artist, $1,200," and in lieu thereof to insert "two clerks or artists, at $1,200 each."

Mr. SMOOT. In the copy of the bill which I have the word "each" does not appear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee has called the attention of the Secretary to that, and the amendment is correctly stated in the copy which the Secretary is using. The amendment will be agreed to as last stated in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask if there is some other bill being used at the Secretary's desk than the one which is now on the desks of Senators?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Chair is informed that there were two places in which the amendments of the committee were not correctly printed in the copies of the bill which are on the desks of Senators, and those corrections will be stated. One has just been stated.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 17, line 22, after the word "fruits,' to strike out "$56,115" and insert "$58,225," so as to make the clause read:

For the control of diseases of orchard and other fruits, $58,225.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if the increase proposed by that amendment is made to cover an amount named in an amendment introduced by me, which I think was to be inserted at that point. The amendment was introduced at the instance of some one in the department. I offered the amendment to provide for the investigations of fruit rot, spotting, and apple mildew, $2,640, which covers that increase.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 18, line 3, after the word "control," to strike out "$57,175" and insert "$67,950," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, including a study of the nature and habits of the parasitic fungi causing the chestnut-tree bark disease, the white-pine blister rust, and other epidemic tree diseases, for the purpose of discovering new methods of control, $67,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 6, after the word "plants," to strike out "$56,000" and insert "$51,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the control of diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, drug and related plants, $51,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on information received since the committee recommended this reduction, for the committee I wish to withdraw that amendment. The House figures ought to remain. I will say that the House increased the estimates of the department; the committee reduced it to the estimates, but upon information since received it is the judgment of myself and others that the former amount, the amount provided by the House, should remain in the bill. I therefore ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be disagreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 19, line 5, after the word "investigations," to strike out "$19,770" and insert "$22,270," so as to make the clause read:

For crop technological and fiber plant investigations, $22,270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 22, after the word "diseases," to insert "and the testing and breeding of flax," so as to read:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases and the testing and breeding of flax, and for the investigation and improvement of broom corn and methods of broom-corn production.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 19, line 25, after the words "broom-corn production," to strike out "$139,505" and insert "$142,005."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question at that point. I suggested an amendment covering that increase, and, as I understand, the amendment in the bill has been made to meet the requirements of the department in connection with some experimental work in the central part of the State of Washington near Waterville. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the increase at this place is due to a transfer from the following page. It was stricken out on another page and transferred to this place.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator did not understand my statement. I suggested an amendment to strike out "$139,505" and to insert "$142,005." Now, the committee has done that. I suggested that amendment for the purpose, as expressed in my amendment, of providing an increase of $2,500 for use in connection with the experiment station at Waterville, Wash. I did that because the department gave the people out there to understand that they would contribute about $2,500. Then it was found that a mistake had been made and that they had not really made an estimate for it. So I suggested this amendment in order to cover that situation, and I want to be sure whether the committee made the amendment in accordance with my suggestion or with some other understanding.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I can not give the Senator the information at this moment. I suggest that the amendment be passed over temporarily.

Mr. JONES. Very well; I will ask that it be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 20, line 8, after "$10,840," to strike out "Provided, That $5,000 of this amount may be used in testing and breeding flax, with a view to increasing the quality and oil content of flaxseed, including rotation experiments and demonstrations," so as to make the clause read:

For testing and breeding fibrous plants, including the testing of flax straw, in cooperation with the North Dakota Agricultural College, which may be used for paper making, $10,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 8, after the word "country," to strike out "$75,400" and insert "$70,400," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction, including the study, collection, purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries and from our possessions, and for experiments with reference to their introduction and cultivation in this country, $70,400.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the reduction of $5,000 is made in that item?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 22, beginning with line 3 down to and including line 9, there occurs this provision:

For investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction, including the study, collection, purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries and from our possessions, and for experiments with reference to their introduction and cultivation in this country, $75,400.

That amount has been reduced by the committee to $70,400.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in the bill as it passed the House there were several transfers from the lump-fund appropriations to the statutory roll, and a corresponding reduction was made in the lump fund. This reduction is made to cover the reduction that ought to follow, in the judgment of the committee, from those transfers; otherwise the transfers would have been made to the statutory roll without any resulting reduction in the lump fund.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think, if we are going to spend money "for investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction, including the study, collection, purchase, testing," and so forth, of rare plants, the amount appropriated ought to be sufficient to do the work well. I am rather inclined to the belief that, if we are going to be extravagant at all, it should be along this line, and I hardly understand how the reduction of $5,000 in this particular item would have any effect whatever upon the transfer to the statutory roll.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the committee adopted that rule. A number of transfers had been made in the bill as it passed the House from the lump-fund appropriations to the statutory roll, but, as a rule, there was no corresponding reduction in any of the lump sums. We rather favored the transfer to the statutory roll, but were of the opinion that a corresponding reduction ought to be made in the lump fund.

I will say further to the Senator that, in connection with this particular appropriation, the department said that owing to conditions in connection with international trade there was not the same necessity for this appropriation as heretofore; that they would not need so much money, because it would be more difficult to procure seed and in all probability importations would be very largely reduced. The direct reason, however, is that certain clerks were transferred from the lump fund to the statutory rolls, and reductions were made to correspond to those changes.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I think that no reduction of this kind was made in the committee, unless the Secretary of Agriculture, who was present, stated that in his judgment the reduction safely could be made. As the chairman of the committee has well said, in many cases the reduction was made because in some other part of the bill the matter had been taken care of. I do not think we ought to increase any of these amounts or change them without very good reason, because I think the committee has been very, very liberal in meeting all the requirements and suggestions of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 22, line 16, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$39,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds; for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, including the investigation of the utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants; and to conduct investigations to determine the most effective methods of eradicating weeds, $119,920: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $100,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of drought-resistant field seeds throughout the Great Plains area and other dry-land sections of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask whether the appropriation for seed distribution is in this bill?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will state that the appropriation for the congressional seed distribution has been stricken out by the committee.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 23, line 1, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$1,455,135" and insert "$1,472,845."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 1, to strike out:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $252,540. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated; and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided, also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry, and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I notice that the amendment just stated by the Secretary strikes out the provision for the distribution of seeds. Are we to understand that the Senate committee amended the bill to the extent of striking out the appropriation for the distribution of seeds?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, when the last agricultural appropriation bill was passed by the Senate, and when the bill prior to that was passed, the Senate after considerable discussion voted to eliminate the seed provision from the House bill. The House, as eveybody knows, insisted that it go back in conference; but the committee felt obliged to be governed by the sense of the Senate as heretofore expressed on two different occasions.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I move now that the Senate disagree to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma to allow the amendment to go over for the present.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, we can return to it after we pass through the bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the entire amendment, including the amendment striking out "$2,131,825" and inserting "$1,896,995," in line 16, on page 25, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the entire amendment will be passed over as indicated by the Senator from Utah.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Forest Service" in the item of appropriation for "General expenses, Forest Service," on page 39, line 20, after "$400,000," to insert "of which sum not to exceed $3,000 may be expended in the erection of a headquarters building at the Grand Canyon National Monument," so as to make the clause read:

For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests, $400,000, of which sum not to exceed $3,000 may be expended in the erection of a headquarters building at the Grand Canyon National Monument.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 9, to insert:

That hereafter all moneys received toward cooperative work in forest investigations or in the protection and improvement of national forests or in the survey, examination, and appraisal of lands and timber, the exchange of which shall have been or hereafter may be authorized by Congress for the purpose of eliminating private holdings in national forests or of consolidating lands of the United States therein, shall be covered into the Treasury and shall constitute a special fund, which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for the payment of the expenses of said work and of refunds to the contributors of amounts heretofore or hereafter paid in by them in excess of their share of the cost of said work: Provided, That annual report shall be made to Congress of all such moneys so received as contributions for such cooperative work. And hereafter in lieu of requiring purchasers of national forest timber to dispose of the brush and débris resulting from cutting operations the Secretary of Agriculture may require them to deposit in the Treasury such sum in each case as he may consider necessary to cover the cost to the United States of such work, and the moneys so deposited shall constitute a special fund, which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended, to enable the Secretary to pay such cost and to make refunds of any amounts deposited by such purchasers in excess of such cost.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain the full intent and meaning of that amendment. In reading it so hurriedly I could hardly understand it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the present practice is, when timber is purchased in forest reserves, that the parties purchasing the timber are required to destroy or burn the brush and débris. They do that from time to time, and the danger of forest fire is great. This plan requires that the Secretary of Agriculture may require parties purchasing timber to make a deposit sufficient, in the judgment of the Secretary, to cover the cost of removing or destroying or burning the débris, and if the deposit in any particular case should exceed the actual cost of the removal of the obstruction the excess is returned to the party making the deposit.

Mr. SMOOT. If every farmer who purchases timber from a forest reserve to secure the timber he may want for his use is required to make a deposit, I am afraid a great many of those farmers will be compelled to go without the timber. The cutting of the timber is generally done in the spring or summer, and I know farmers who have not the money to make the deposit; and it does seem to me that it is a hardship to be placed upon them that is not necessary.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. PAGE. This matter was very carefully discussed in the committee, and the Secretary of Agriculture was present. He did not intimate that this was a course that would be generally pursued, but in certain cases he said it was quite essential that the department should be given this power. If the Senator from Utah will read the matter carefully he will see that it says "the Secretary of Agriculture may." It does not say that he shall require this plan to be followed. It is simply a privilege given to him in case he thinks the interests of the Government demand that extra care shall be taken in regard to forest fires or things of that kind, in which case he may ask that the provisions of this amendment shall be applied.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Vermont that of course I have no doubt this subject was discussed in the committee, and perhaps the Secretary of Agriculture was present and gave his views upon that amendment; but that does not prevent me, at least, calling attention to the hardships that will come to many of the farmers who cut timber from Government lands.

Mr. PAGE. It is hardly to be expected that where farmers go in to cut just a little timber for their own use the Secretary will insist upon the application of this provision. This, as I understand, is to take care of some of the larger cuttings, where there is a good deal of débris left around which ought to be gathered up under the supervision of the officers of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has followed this question very closely, he will remember that the charge in the past has been that it is the small man who cuts timber on a forest reserve who causes the fires. I thought the arrangement that exists to-day was severe enough upon the farmer without imposing upon him the further necessity of depositing a sum of money with the Secretary of Agriculture before he can secure the timber.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that my understanding was that it was to be made general; that no one should be permitted to go into the forests and cut timber unless he had made a deposit, and in that way to prevent forest fires. Of course, I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment, but I think there is a great deal of force in the argument made by the Senator from Utah, that in many cases it would be a hardship to the small man who goes in there to cut his wood or perhaps secure material for posts or fences.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota is always very attentive to the proceedings at committee meetings, and I will trust his memory even further than my own.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not say that the statement of the Senator from Vermont is incorrect, but I gathered from what the Secretary said that it was to be a general provision, a provision to be generally applied——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. And that no one would be permitted hereafter to enter the national forests and cut any timber unless a deposit was made sufficient to take care of this débris, burn it, and in that way prevent forest fires. I think the Senator from Utah is correct in the position he has taken.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is not the first time this subject matter has been up for discussion. It has always been opposed in the past, and I certainly think it should be defeated at this time. The men who ought to receive a benefit from the forest timber are the farmers who live adjacent and near our forest reserves. The Lord knows it is hard enough for them now to hunt up a forester and secure a permit to go in and get a few fence poles, and now to compel those men to make a cash deposit, I say, Mr. President, in fifty cases out of a hundred it will be impossible for them to do it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I made no objection to this language going into the bill. I did make this observation, that there were members on the committee who knew more about the affairs in the western country, and especially about the national forests, and I thought if it was not a good provision they would object to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator exactly what this deposit is intended to cover?

Mr. SMOOT. This deposit is intended to cover the expense that may be undergone by the forester or the assistants upon the forest reserve in cleaning up the cuttings that may come from the cutting of timber.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do not the regulations require that the débris shall be cleared up by the purchaser?

Mr. SMOOT. The present requirements are such as to compel them to do it, and now they are not satisfied with that, but they want to require that a deposit of money shall be made with the forester.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it not the duty of the forester to see that the regulation or the law, whatever it is in that respect, is complied with?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I want to say to the Senator that in the past it has been strictly complied with.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no difficulty in Germany or France in having every twig cleared from the ground by any person who fells a tree, and I do not see why when we have Federal officers to control those matters it should not be their duty and they should not be held accountable if they neglect to see that the débris is cleared from the land.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GORE. I will say that this provision is intended to relate to timber-sale contracts. Its purpose is to diminish fire risks. It is true that under the present system the purchasers of timber are required to remove or to burn the débris. That is inconvenient to those purchasers in many instances, as will be apparent to Senators. This proposition is to require them to make a deposit sufficient to cover the cost of burning or removing the débris, and the excess if any is to be returned to the purchaser. It is a matter of convenience to them and a matter of great security in preventing forest fires.

Further, to illuminate the subject I will request the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to read a paragraph from the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture. It will be seen that it is to be limited to timber sale contracts. If it should be applied to a farmer purchasing a few posts, as suggested by the Senator from Utah, I myself should certainly oppose it.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read one part of the amendment, so that the Senator can see just what the provision covers:

> And hereafter in lieu of requiring purchasers of national forest timber to dispose of the brush and débris resulting from cutting operations the Secretary of Agriculture may require them to deposit in the Treasury such sum in each case as he may consider necessary to cover the cost to the United States of such work, and the money so deposited—

And so forth. That applies to all purchasers of national forest timber.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator from Nebraska proceeds, will he kindly allow the Senator from Florida to read what the Secretary of Agriculture says?

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Florida to read what the Secretary of Agriculture says.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will read what the Secretary said about it, and I think it will be very apparent. As the Senator from Oklahoma says, it refers not to a mere incidental tree or cordwood or firewood or something of that sort, as the case may be, but it has application to regular timber contracts. Here is what the Secretary of Agriculture says:

> The amendment provides for the receipt and disbursement of funds by the Government from purchasers of timber from the national forests to defray the expenses connected with the burning of brush and débris resulting from their timber operations. All timber-sale contracts for national forest timber require that brush and débris shall be burned at the expense of the operator, the contract stipulating a maximum expenditure for which the operator is liable under the requirement. These expenses are now met directly by him. It has not always been practicable, however, for operators to burn brush and débris from timber-sale operations at the most opportune time on account of lack of men or the necessity of employing all men available to them on other major features of their operations. It is intended by the amendment to have the required sum now specified in national forest timber-sale contracts deposited by the operator in the United States Treasury, with which sum the Forest Service can directly defray the expense of brush and débris disposal on the timber-sale areas to which the deposit is applicable. The amendment, proposed for the more adequate and efficient protection and administration of the national forests, will insure the disposal of brush and débris at the proper time and in the proper manner within the maximum liability specified in the timber-sale contract.

I think that makes the point clear.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate again that where there are small purchasers of timber in the western forest reserve—and most of them are small purchasers—there is a requirement made of them to-day that all the débris and branches shall be disposed of, and I have not heard any complaint in the past that that has not been done. I have never heard a solitary small purchaser of timber asked that he be allowed to make a cash deposit in order that he may get what little timber from a forest reserve he may need.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to ask the Senator from Utah, if I understand this correctly, that the purchase is made of timber in a forest reserve, and the present regulations require that the purchaser, who ordinarily, I suppose, would be a poor man, shall clear up the land after the tree or trees have been removed. As I understand this amendment, the poor man is not allowed to do that work at his own expense, giving him employment, but it is put in the hands of officials of the Government to do it and to require a cash payment from the purchaser of the timber for that purpose. Am I correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what this amendment provides.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment. I can plainly see that if there was a large purchase of timber by a man running a great sawmill and cutting millions of feet of lumber, he could well say, "I will make a cash deposit, and I will allow the foresters here to destroy and burn up the débris and brush"; but where there is one of those there are a hundred small purchasers, and it is going to place a burden upon them which should not be placed upon them. It is hard enough now to get the timber off the forest reserves without placing more burdens on them than are placed to-day.

I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Utah that in a case of this kind the Government always exacts sufficient money for the purpose; that is, its estimate is large enough to cover the purpose for which it is required, and in many instances if not in most the amounts so required are greater than the actual cost. The difficulties which beset a man in trying to get a refund of that money are very great, and when you consider the delay and the expense it is far more than the amount of the surplus. As a general thing he is poor and is unable to stand the loss. This imposes a burden upon him that may become intolerable.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado has well stated the point. I can imagine a case of this kind, Mr. President, a small timber purchaser cutting what little timber he does has created débris and brush; perhaps $20 will be required from him as a deposit. When it is destroyed it is found that the cost was $16, and I say now that it will be worth more than the $4 to get that amount out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I know that in my State this amendment would work very great hardship. The homesteaders in New Mexico, in undertaking to acquire homesteads, need fence posts, and they have to secure a contract with the forester for a certain number of posts. This amendment leaves it entirely in the hands of the forester to estimate what he assumes will be the cost of gathering the brush and burning it. This requirement can be made very harsh. Even if it is considered to be absolutely just it will still in fact be so harsh upon the homesteader that it will be impossible for him to comply with it. The homesteaders in our country have not the cash to make deposits for purposes of this kind. They have the muscle, the labor, and the desire to do the work themselves, and they will do it. If they are required to deposit $20 or $50 in cash or even $10 in cash at times it would really preclude them from availing themselves of the law under which they can purchase the fence posts at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that it seems to me the best and most expeditious way to get at this matter is to move to amend the amendment by striking out of it all after the word "work" in line 25 on page 40.

Mr. SMOOT. The suggestion of the Senator from Colorado is a good one, but I think the best thing to do is to make a point of order against the whole amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not as familiar with the part of the amendment which precedes. I have not read it carefully.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota, as he rose first.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to another provision of the amendment which does not relate to forest fires or protection therefrom or cooperation in the extinguishment of forest fires. It is that clause of the amendment relating to the survey examination and appraisal of lands and timber, the exchange of which shall have been or hereafter may be authorized by Congress for the purpose of eliminating private holdings in national forests or of consolidating lands of the United States therein.

The first part of the amendment relates to cooperation or cooperative work in forest investigation. My question is as to whether in the case of a survey examination and appraisal of lands and timber for the purpose of exchange the settler is required to contribute or the one who has a private holding in a forest reserve is obliged to contribute to such survey examination and appraisal.

Mr. SMOOT. I think under the present practice that is required, but I do believe that that ought to be covered in the Treasury direct. I think it is held as a special fund, but it is covered into the Treasury of the United States. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if I am right in that statement?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am not able to state, without examining a memorandum I have here, what the present practice is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the Senator from Wyoming can tell us.

Mr. GORE. As I remember, this amendment was brought forward by the committee last year and perhaps went out. I think the department desires this particular amendment, because they have had some trouble with respect to bookkeeping. Some bank perhaps failed in which the money was deposited. I am not quite sure, however, without examining my memorandum.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, I do not want to put this burden upon the small man on account of some money in a bank having been lost or the bank having failed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think another proposition involved in this is perhaps the exchange of lands between the General Government and the State where State school land happens to fall within a reserve. I think there is no provision of law now authorizing an exchange so that the State can consolidate its holdings.

Mr. SMOOT. This has nothing to do with that law. This is a question of exchange where money is involved, and it shall be kept as a special fund in the Treasury.

Mr. GORE. After consulting the memoranda, I find there is no law now authorizing this to be done. I will ask the Senator from Florida to read an extract from the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. In just a line this memoranda says:

There is no legislation at present permitting the receipt and disbursement of such funds by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, however, Mr. President, there has been a practice in the past of having cooperative work. I do not know how the funds have been handled, but I have always taken the position that the fund ought to be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and whenever a dollar is paid out from the Treasury it ought to be upon a requisition of some head of a department.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to make this statement in connection with the question I asked the Senator from Utah, namely, that I suppose it is the policy of the Government to eliminate the private holdings from forest-reserve lands. If that is true, it does not seem to me to be right that the man who owns the private holding should be required to contribute anything toward the survey, examination, or appraisal of the land.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully agree with the Senator in that statement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield the floor now to the Senator from Montana, but I want to say that at the end of the discussion I shall make the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I hope the Senator from Utah will not feel moved to make the point of order as to any portion of the amendment down to and including the paragraph which has been the subject of discussion, leaving in the earlier provision.

Mr. THOMAS. It was my suggestion to strike out the last sentence.

Mr. WALSH. That can be done; but I think the Senator from South Dakota, however, is in error concerning the significance of the first portion of this amendment. It deals with two subjects. They are entirely unrelated and ought not to have been thus combined. The one is contributions made by cooperative work for the purpose of preventing fire or putting out fire. As is well known, the private owners of timberlands, the States, and the National Government are all interested in the prevention of fires. They work together, and private owners make contributions which are to be utilized under the direction and supervision of the Forestry Service for the purpose of accomplishing the work that they all desire to have done.

Now, if that went into the General Treasury, it would be very difficult indeed to get it in shape so that it could be utilized. It seems to me quite proper that that should go into a special fund which the Secretary of Agriculture, who has charge of the Forestry Service, could utilize at any time he saw fit.

Next the amendment deals with another matter, which is not the elimination of private holding within the forest reserve at all. I will say for the benefit of the Senator from South Dakota——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree with me that that seems to be the plain reading of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. STERLING. The amendment, in the first place, surely contemplates a fund to be derived from the survey, examination, and appraisal of lands, the exchange of which shall have been or hereafter may be authorized by Congress for the purpose of eliminating private holdings in national forests.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is right about that. I read it hurriedly.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. "Or of consolidating lands of the United States therein." That, it seems to me, should go into the private fund as well, so that it could be utilized for that purpose.

Mr. GORE. This amendment is undoubtedly liable to a point of order, and I see no use in protracting the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The Chair rules that the point of order is sustained.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 22, to insert:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to reimburse forest officers or other persons for horses, vehicles, or equipment lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used for necessary fire fighting, trail, or official business, such reimbursement to be made from any available funds in the appropriation to which the use or hire of such equipment is properly chargeable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is an entire change from the existing regulations of the department. There is no law, of course, covering that item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah make the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. It does seem to me that that is opening a door for claims against the Government of the United States that ought never to be opened. Congress has never hesitated to pass a bill relieving a forester, a supervisor, for the loss of a horse or of property of any kind.

Mr. WALSH. My understanding is that this is not the forestry officer at all, but it applies to a private individual whose horse is hired. The forester goes to a liveryman, and says, "There is a fire out here and I want a team to drive out to it." He drives the team and the horses are killed while he is gone. It does seem to me that a provision to cover such a case is proper.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read the amendment to the Senator, and see if it does not include both classes. It reads:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to reimburse forest officers or other persons for horses, vehicles, or equipment lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used for necessary fire fighting, trail, or official business, such reimbursement to be made from any available funds in the appropriation to which the use or hire of such equipment is properly chargeable.

That reads, "To reimburse forest officers or other persons for horses" hired. It does seem to me that wherever a forest officer hires a horse or a vehicle of any kind, or if it is his own horse used in the service, and it is lost, the claim ought to come to Congress and be paid just as such claims have been paid in the past. It seems to me that this would invite a forest officer who had a horse that he desired to get rid of to see that it was lost and make a claim on the Government for reimbursement. I repeat it is opening a door, Mr. President, that should not be opened. All claims against the Government of the United States, outside of those that are provided for for Army and Navy officers, come to Congress.

We passed to-day a claim to reimburse a postmaster for stamps lost; there was reported yesterday a claim of $1,500 for beer stamps that were lost in transportation. An untold number of claims have been presented, but here we are proposing to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to settle certain claims. I believe that is an unwise policy to inaugurate, and I shall make the point of order against the amendment unless the Senator from Oklahoma desires to say something upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah make the point of order?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Just a word, Mr. President. I will say that under the Agricultural appropriation bill passed March 4, 1913, the Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to reimburse private parties for the loss of horses and vehicles where the loss occurred fighting forest fires. The law requires that certain employees on forest reserves shall furnish their own horses. It was the view of the Secretary of Agriculture that such parties losing horses ought to be reimbursed in the same manner and to the same extent as should private parties. I suppose it was a matter of dispatch in order to avoid the expense and delay of securing reimbursement by a more circuitous route, as indicated a few moments ago, might occur when they were trying to recover the excess deposited.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that the provision he speaks of refers only to the loss of horses in fighting forest fires.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. But this goes to private parties, and it goes to officers not only in fighting of fires, but for losses on the trail; that is, in regular, everyday business or on official business of any kind; in fact, it covers every officer in the Forest Service. If any one of them loses a horse from any cause, the Secretary of Agriculture is allowed to reimburse him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah makes a point of order against the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I make the point of order against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GORE. The amendment is, no doubt, liable to the point of order; but I ask to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum from the Secretary of Agriculture, stating the reasons which actuated him in recommending the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

(12) Page 40, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following:

"That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to reimburse forest officers or other persons for horses, vehicles, or equipment lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used for necessary fire fighting, trail, or official business, such reimbursement to be made from any available funds in the appropriation to which the use or hire of such equipment is properly chargeable."

NOTE.—This item was approved by the House Committee on Agriculture, with the restriction that reimbursement be made only for horses, vehicles, or equipment lost or damaged while being used in fire-fighting or other unforeseen emergencies, but was stricken out on a point of order. It is deemed to be no more than fair that forest officers should receive the same protection as other owners of horses, vehicles, or equipment lost or damaged while being used on Government work, and therefore it is recommended that the amendment as above be included in the bill.

The act of March 4, 1913, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, provided for reimbursement to "owners of horses, vehicles, and other equipment lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used for necessary fire fighting, trail, or official business." It has been decided by the Comptroller of the Treasury that this act does not authorize reimbursement of forest officers for the loss of or damage to horses, vehicles, or other equipment which they are required to furnish in the performance of their official duties. During the past two years there have been several cases in which forest officers who were using their own horses and vehicles in fire fighting or other official business have suffered losses from unusual causes which could not be foreseen or from which they could not escape, and inability to secure reimbursement has caused them to suffer great hardship.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 42, after line 4, to insert:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, under regulations to be prescribed by him, is hereby authorized to permit the Navy Department to take from the national forests such earth, stone, and timber for the use of the Navy as may be compatible with the administration of the national forests for the purposes for which they are established, and also in the same manner to permit the taking of earth, stone, and timber from the national forests for the construction of Government railways and other Government works in Alaska: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit with his annual estimates a report of the quantity and value of earth, stone, and timber furnished as herein provided.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what the income for the Forest Service was for the year just ended, if he has the figures at his disposal?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have not the figures immediately available, but I will say that it was something in the neighborhood of $3,000,000. I will furnish the figures to the Senator later.

Mr. THOMAS. A little bit more than half of the amount it cost the Government to look after and administer these reserves?

Mr. GORE. Something more than half. I do not remember the exact amount.

Mr. THOMAS. My impression is that when the proposed leasing system is in full operation the difference between operation and income will be much more startling than that.

Mr. GORE. I think the Forestry Service ought to be made self-sustaining, if possible.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 42, after line 17, to insert:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon such terms as he may deem proper, for periods not exceeding 30 years, permit responsible persons or associations to use and occupy suitable spaces or portions of ground in the national forests for the construction of summer homes, hotels, stores, or other structures needed for recreation or public convenience, not exceeding 10 acres to any one person or association, but this shall not be construed to interfere with the right to enter homesteads upon agricultural lands in national forests as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not feel that the remark made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a few moments ago ought to be allowed to pass without a word at least. My recollection is that when the great extension in the forestry system took place some 10 or 12 years ago it was promised that long before this time not only would the forests be self-sustaining, but that they would be a source of very considerable revenue to the National Government. That promise apparently has not been realized, for quite obviously the receipts do not now nearly cover the expenditures necessary, and the timber is being consumed without any real substantial benefit, so far as that is concerned.

At the same time, Mr. President, what policy shall we pursue with respect to the matter? Shall we allow the great forests that cover the mountain slopes of the Western States to remain absolutely unprotected from the ravages of fire and depredations of all kinds? Obviously the Senator from Colorado does not mean to say that. He does not desire that no appropriation shall be made for the care and preservation of the forests.

Mr. President, the State of Montana is the owner of very extensive tracts of timberland. It had large grants from the National Government at the time it was admitted into the Union; and every time that it was found possible to select timberlands under that grant, exercising the same degree of prudence and influenced by the same selfish motives that would actuate a private owner under the same circumstances, the State went on and selected valuable timberlands. It has not stood idly by and allowed those lands, which it thus owns and which are of immense value to it, to become the prey of forest fires which, regrettable as it may be, sweep over the country and destroy millions of values every year. They are annually making an appropriation to protect those forests in exactly the same way, as was indicated awhile ago, private owners are banding themselves together in timber associations, having exactly the same purpose in mind.

All this simply means, Mr. President, that we are not going to abandon the policy of exercising a fostering care over the national forests; and those of us who have suffered from the administration of the law by a lot of incompetent and inefficient representatives can not, as it seems to me, advance our cause by criticisms that would imply the necessity of absolutely wiping out the entire system. If we are hoping to secure any relief whatever from the conditions that have been found oppressive in every State in which these national forests exist, we must start in by standing upon the proposition that protection must be accorded to the forests from depredations of one kind or another, from the ravages of insects, and from destruction by fire and the elements generally.

Mr. President, I am unable to agree with my esteemed friend from the State of Colorado—and I am always pleased to work with him and usually find myself in accord with him—that the so-called leasing system bears any kind of relation, except the most remote relation, to the forestry reserve system.

Furthermore, Mr. President, so far as the leasing system is concerned, now that I am speaking about this matter I will refer to it briefly. It has not been seriously proposed—and I desire to have that distinctly understood—that it shall be applied to the general body of our agricultural land or to our mineral lands, except such minerals as primarily become the source of power, such as coal, oil, and gas, and likewise those minerals, nonmetallic in character, that occur in great bodies located by the Government itself through the operations of the Geological Survey, such as potash, phosphates, asphaltum, and other nonmetallic minerals of that character.

Mr. President, while speaking of this matter, I want to invite the attention of the Senate, because this is a most opportune time to do so, to a feature of the bill which has thus impliedly had the criticism of the distinguished Senator from the State of Colorado. I refer to that provision of the so-called leasing bill for the disposition of lands containing deposits of phosphates. We import large quantities of potash, which is a deposit of much the same character as phosphate—we import enormous quantities of potash, for instance, from Germany. That supply is now shut off. It becomes the source of nitrogen and potassium and is used in many different ways, but I want to speak particularly about phosphates.

There are great deposits of phosphates, the source of one of the most valuable fertilizers known to agricultural science, in the States of Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, and Montana. The State of Florida exports annually, when the foreign market is open to her, $9,000,000 worth of that product. Great areas of land containing these valuable deposits have been withdrawn from entry, so that to-day there is absolutely no law whatever under which any of those great deposits may be utilized. The people who desire to utilize them, the people who are willing to put their money into them, instead of taking an absolute conveyance of these lands from the Government, are perfectly satisfied with the bill which has been introduced here for the utilization of those phosphate properties. Let me tell you about that.

Those deposits are insoluble. They are made soluble and valuable for fertilizing purposes by the application of sulphuric acid. The fertilizers thus obtained are extensively used, and it is appropriate to discuss the matter in connection with the agricultural appropriation bill. They are now being shipped to Japan across the Pacific Ocean. They are used in California; they are used in intensive farming of all kinds; and now extensive experiments are being conducted in all of the Northwestern States for the utilization of that fertilizer upon the wheat fields of the Northwest, to increase the product of grain in that great region. Those deposits, as I have said, are made soluble by the application of sulphuric acid. That is all that is needed.

In the State of Utah there is a great copper smelter; in the State of Montana are two great copper smelters, which are annually belching into the atmosphere tons and tons and tons of sulphuric acid, to the destruction of vegetation all around. There is no use for it now at all. All you have to do is to save that sulphuric acid and apply it to these phosphate deposits, and you then will have a product that easily can produce $25,000,000 of value a year, and that would easily increase the productive capacity of the lands all over the Northwest from 25 to 40 or 50 per cent.

It affects, Mr. President, only the States of Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, and Utah. The people there want the law; at least, the people of my State, for whom I speak, want this valuable product utilized. We have an opportunity to build up a great industry there, but there is not any law by which the deposits can be made available.

The so-called leasing bill, which has received the strictures of the distinguished Senator from Colorado, provides that anyone who desires to do so may take a lease of 2,560 acres of land containing phosphate deposits, upon such terms as he and the Secretary of the Interior may agree. That is all there is to it. I do not see any reason why that bill should not pass without an objection from the floor here. Bear in mind that this great gas, Mr. President, is not only escaping uselessly into the atmosphere day after day and year after year, but it is actually destroying vegetation in the rich valley of the Deerlodge in my State.

Why, Mr. President, they are now installing at the great smelter works in the city of Anaconda, under the direction of the Bureau of Mines, a plant for the extraction of sulphuric acid from the fumes that escape from the smokestacks. There is practically no purpose to which to apply it. All of it could be utilized, or the most of it could be utilized, in the preparation of this valuable product. Here we go, day after day. The water-power bill is exactly the same. They are values of the very highest character. Speaking about conservation, I am talking conservation to you. Here is a great value that is escaping from you day by day. The water-power bill is in the same situation. Here we are; a million dollars a day is being spent for coal in this country for the production of power that could be just as easily produced by the water which runs idly and unused along in the channels of our rivers.

Mr. President, the other day a gentleman called me out into the Marble Room who represents capital to the extent of $10,000,000 willing to go into the development of a power plant just across the line from the State of Idaho in the State of Washington—the Senator from Idaho will know the place perfectly well—for the production there of nitrogenous products, also for fertilizing purposes, and for use in many of the arts. Ten million dollars is ready to go into that enterprise there, and yet the water-power bill can not pass here because of some academic objections that some gentlemen have to some features of it.

I trust that some day or other we will be able to consider these questions as practical questions of legislation that confront us. I have very great regard and esteem for the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who does not want this leasing bill passed. He does not want to permit us to dispose of the phosphate lands in the State of Montana as we would like to dispose of them. I would be quite willing to agree to sell them to anybody who might want to buy them, but we can not get a law of that kind passed, and we can get the other; but such opposition as this is made to it. I think that if we would take these things as practical questions of legislation for the purpose of seeing what we can do without violating fundamental principles, we could solve some of these questions a little more rapidly; and I still entertain the hope that at some time before the termination of this session we shall be able to get through either the power bill or the bill to give us an opportunity to utilize our phosphate deposits, at least.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If I had supposed that my criticisms of the probable economic results of a leasing system would have aroused my good friend from Montana to such a vigorous protest, I would not have made them; but in view of his defense of the forestry reserves and his advocacy of a leasing law, which carried with it a condemnation of my position, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate for a very few moments.

I am opposed to the present forest reserve system because I believe it to be wasteful, extravagant, and carried to such an extreme that no justification can be made of it. I assure my friend that I am quite as anxious to preserve the forests as he can be. I believe, and always have believed, that they can be best preserved by the people of the respective States wherein they are situated; and I could not but think, as the Senator was eloquently advocating the so-called leasing bill, that if his great State of Montana had control, as it should have control, and ownership of the great phosphate beds and other mineral deposits in that State, it would be very easy for its people to develop them as a part of its own resources and increase its wealth and its population.

When I consider that the forest reserves of the United States consist for the greater part of territory upon which there are no forests, upon which there never were any forests, and upon which there never can be any forests, great tracts of land which were reserved in order to enable those who owned a great part of them to relinquish and exchange them for some of the most valuable lands in the world; and when I further consider that an enormous number of so-called inspectors, field agents, employees, rangers, and other forces under the pay of the Government of the United States are maintained at public expense for the purpose of looking after forest reservations where there are no forests, I think he will agree with me that a much better system could be devised.

It is true that in these forest reservations agricultural land may be homesteaded; but it is equally true that, owing to the many inspections and examinations that are made between a location and its entry, and the many difficulties of obtaining a patent between the date of location and the time when it is issued, with which he is quite as familiar as I am, the situation is almost as bad as though the reservations were absolute.

I want to see the West developed. I want to see it developed as the East and the Mississippi Valley country were developed. I want to see it developed by that sturdy American citizenship which, dependent upon its own resources, wants to avail itself of the largess of the Government, and, by acquiring freeholds upon the public domain, add them to the taxable wealth of the country, establish homes, raise families, and increase populations to the end not only that the western Commonwealths may prosper and wax exceeding strong but that they may contribute of their wealth to the common purposes and growth of the Nation.

I believe—and that is my fundamental objection to the leasing system—that it is un-American. We can not be a great people if our people are a tenantry, and it makes no difference whether the landlord be an individual, a corporation, or the Government of the United States. It is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield; yes.

Mr. WALSH. I apprehend the Senator would not imagine that any of us would dispute the proposition that the great bulk of the people of the country ought not to be tenantry; but the Senator will bear in mind that these are not agricultural lands that a man is going to cultivate, and that nobody proposes that the leasing system shall be applied to such lands. Now, why should the Senator make that suggestion when it comes to a matter of phosphate lands?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think that if in 1872 our mining laws had been framed upon the theory of the pending leasing measure the great State of Montana would be far less populous than it is at present, and therefore far less prosperous; and I can conceive of no reason why I, a citizen of the United States, can go upon the public land and locate a lead mine, a gold mine, a silver mine, and at the same time should be obliged to lease other forms of metalliferous or mineral deposits from the United States. If one is wrong, the other is also reprehensible.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to tell the Senator why; and the Senator knows likewise that it is not proposed to apply the principle to metallic mines or veins that a man must go out and labor for years to find, bringing to his aid the very highest kind of prospecting skill.

Mr. THOMAS. Why does the Senator say it is not proposed to do that? I want to tell him that if he starts upon this leasing policy, that will be the next step.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well, of course——

Mr. THOMAS. And, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], it is even proposed now. In fact, the Senator himself is the author of a measure which, as originally framed, was designed, if I remember correctly, to reserve from the locators of this country all of the public mineral lands which were supposed to contain radium.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I never introduced a bill of that sort.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not say the Senator introduced the bill, but my recollection is that that was the theory upon which the Senator sought to frame it.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is in error.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad to be corrected.

Mr. WALSH. The idea never entered my head. It never entered the mind of anybody who ever talked with me upon the subject. I am opposed to it as resolutely and as determinedly as the Senator himself can be. So far as the development of the State of Montana is concerned, it was developed through its metallic mines of gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc; and nobody proposes to touch even a line of the law as it is now written to substitute anything in the nature of a leasing system.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I cheerfully confess my error. My memory was evidently at fault with reference to the Senator; but I know that the Interior Department proposed to do it and that a number of conferences were held, some of which I attended, with the purpose of reserving these lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If that is the case, Mr. President, they very skillfully concealed their purpose from me, and I felt that I was in their confidence.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course I can not speak for the Senator. I know what occurred at the conferences which I attended, and I remember very well that my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] and I took advantage of the opportunity offered and brought the State commissioner of mines and others to Washington in order to protest against that policy, which, I am glad to say, was abandoned by the department.

I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the conservation congress, from which nearly all these bills were originally started, which was held in Kansas City, absolutely indorsed the withdrawal of all mineral lands.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, there is no more question but that this policy, when once entered upon, will be extended to all forms of mineral wealth than that I am now speaking upon the subject to the Senate. But, as I said, I am not going to take the time at present to go extensively into this matter. I have perhaps already trespassed upon the patience of the Senate, and certainly upon that of my friend, the Senator from Oklahoma, who has this bill in charge. I merely wish to say before taking my seat, however, that the prediction which I made a few moments ago and which I now repeat, that the leasing system, if entered upon, will be productive of great loss to the Government, is based upon the experiences which the country has encountered in the administration of the Forestry Service.

The leasing bills and the water-power bill, if they become laws, will result as usual in the multiplication of civil-service employees. No landlord, especially upon the scale which the Government of the United States proposes to inaugurate, can carry this system into effect without constant and careful supervision. It means a lot of additional field officers, inspectors, agents, and supervisors, constantly increasing in number, taking not only the profits which the Government expects to realize, but a large amount of revenues which are raised by taxation besides. It will satisfy some people, perhaps, so far as its financial aspect is concerned, but in my judgment it is foredoomed to failure; and I dare say that away down in his heart, if the Senator from Montana could have his own judgment carried into effect, he would not only oppose with all his heart and with all his great ability the institution of such a system, but he would insist upon the acquisition of title to these properties by citizens of the United States as they have been acquired heretofore.

Before I take my seat let me say that the policy which the Government has entered upon, and which it proposes to continue, is in some respects similar to the policy of Great Britain in the eighteenth century which finally culminated in the American Revolution. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that our Declaration of Independence assigns that as one of the causes of the rebellion of the American Colonies:

> The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. To prove this let facts be submitted to a candid world.
>
>
> He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.
>
> * * * * * * *
> He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

Now, the Government of the United States, so far as its administration of the public lands of the country is concerned, at least those of them that are left, is duplicating the conduct of the King of Great Britain in his administration of the land conditions of the Colonies. We went at that time, and partly in consequence of it, to the extreme of opposition. Nothing of the kind is here contemplated, but this leasing system as a policy of the United States, while it may and probably will become law, will never do so with my vote unless I change my mind very radically upon the subject, which is not at all probable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want just about five minutes, and that is all, because my name has been mentioned.

The Senator from Montana has referred to me and referred to the bills which are now pending before Congress, and incidentally he referred to the fact that the potassium claims that he is so anxious to have leased by the Government are situated in the States of Montana and Utah and Wyoming and Idaho, and that it seemed, from his standpoint at least, that these lands ought to be developed. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the Senators from Utah, the Senators from Wyoming, and the Senators from Idaho are just as anxious for the development of their States as is the Senator from Montana, and yet every Senator from those States is opposed to these leasing bills.

Is it possible that we are obstructing anything by reason of that when three out of four States mentioned are absolutely opposed to this leasing system?

Mr. President, I opened a paper called the Oregonian the other day. There was an account in the Oregonian of February 5, 1915, of a proceeding that took place in the State senate of that State. Some man had the hardihood to get up there in Oregon and propose an indorsement of the Ferris bill, which is the very bill which the Senator from Montana is now advocating. I will only read the headlines, because they are very clear and plain as to what the senate of Oregon felt with relation to that matter. I read:

> Senate on record against Ferris Act.
> Oregon's water-power policy declared.
> All but one for resolution.
> Even Democrats vote against administration bill.
> Eloquent appeals made.
> Approval entails meeting of 50 delegates from 10 Western States at Portland to wage fight for home control.

Mr. President, that article shows that one man who rose and wanted to approve the Ferris Act was immediately met by such a storm that when the vote came the whole senate unanimously, except that one man, voted against it; and not only that, but they put through resolutions condemning the Ferris Act. So if the Senator thinks that the western people are in favor of this leasing proposition, he is sadly mistaken.

I want to say to him that every political convention in our State for years has been against any leasing system, and specifically have they mentioned the rights of the State with respect to the waters of the State. I want to say to him that there were nine governors of nine Western States who met in the city of Salt Lake in 1913 and declared against the leasing system and in favor of the entry system. I will state that in April, 1914, the governors of nine Western States, irrespective of political party, appeared in the city of Denver and held a conference there, and they unanimously decided in favor of an entry system and against a leasing system.

I want to know whether the Senate of the United States wants to force a leasing system upon the people of the West in view of such a unanimous condemnation by the people of the West. If you do, I must say it will be a sad condition indeed. I believe it will begin a war that it will take 50 years, perhaps, to remove, and which, in my judgment, will eventually end in the repeal of such laws.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana does not seem to recognize what is in these leasing bills. He does not seem to recognize that there is a question of the sovereignty of the State in the matter. If there is one principle that is recognized as proper and as inherent in a State itself, it is the right of that State to tax every foot of property within the borders of the State. Yet these bills which are presented here cover subjects that can not be the subject of State taxation. If you are going to deprive the State of the right of taxation upon the property within the limits of that State, Mr. President, you can absolutely deny the right of the State to raise any revenue; you can annihilate the State. When you once surrender an inherent principle of sovereignty that is supposed to exist both under the State constitution and under the Constitution of the United States, you are invading the rights of the State to an extent which I do not believe any people or any Members of the Senate will agree to if they fully understand the situation.

Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate any further. I have made extended remarks on this question, and I do not care to proceed further at this time. I ask that the article to which I referred from the Portland Oregonian may be appended to my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE ON RECORD AGAINST FERRIS ACT—OREGON'S WATER-POWER POLICY DECLARED—ALL BUT ONE FOR RESOLUTION—EVEN DEMOCRATS VOTE AGAINST ADMINISTRATION BILL—ELOQUENT APPEALS MADE—APPROVAL ENTAILS MEETING OF 50 DELEGATES FROM 10 WESTERN STATES AT PORTLAND TO WAGE FIGHT FOR HOME CONTROL.

[By Ronald G. Callvert.]

STATE CAPITOL, Salem, Oreg., February 4.

So far as the senate can accomplish that end, the State of Oregon is committed to the main elements of a definite water-power development policy antagonistic to the Ferris bill now before Congress. If there is anywhere near the unanimity in the house that was exhibited in the senate, Oregon will soon not only have declared this policy, but invited 10 other States of the West to share with it in the effort to preserve for Oregon what is Oregon's, and for the West that which belongs to the West.

Although the Ferris bill is recognized as an administration measure, or at least as one having the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, both Democratic members of the Oregon Senate supported to-day's antagonistic resolution.

Senator Strayer did no more than to vote "aye." Senator Garland spoke in his semihumorous, half-sarcastic way, but finally declared his purpose to support the bill. Later in the debate he outlined briefly and seriously his purposes. They were, he said, to place Oregon's interests above party interests whenever there was conflict.

KELLAHER SOLID MINORITY.

The support given the Ferris bill and the opposition to the resolution defining Oregon's water-power policy and calling a conference of Western States came from the habitual minority of the senate. This minority rallied its entire forces, consisting of one Daniel Kellaher, and voted solidly one vote against the resolution. Everybody else voted for it.

The resolution that has been adopted by the senate has heretofore not only been outlined but published in full in the Oregonian. Briefly, it asserts the State's title to the water within the banks of nonnavigable streams and its title to the waters of navigable streams subject to the paramount rights of commerce; declares the Government's interest in water power because of its ownership of the adjacent lands to be merely incidental; urges the Government to turn over to the water-power sites such unappropriated public lands as are needed for water-power development under terms that will guard against monopoly and speculation; and invites 10 other States to join in electing five delegates, each to attend a conference to be held in Portland next summer or fall to define more definitely the legislation that will be acceptable to the West.

ACTION WHOLLY LEGISLATIVE.

Had it not been for one feature of the resolution it would have received a unanimous vote. At least Minority Leader Kellaher declared that his entire faction would vote for it if selection of delegates were given over to the governor instead of to the legislature. Minority Leader Kellaher was emphatically resentful of what he took to be a slam at Gov. Withycombe.

The explanation given of this feature of the bill, as given by Senators Day and Thompson, was that the issue was wholly a legislative one and should be handled throughout by the legislatures. Senator Thompson pointed out that governors often were susceptible to pleas for appointment as delegates, with the result that reclamation representatives and others who had some interest in the proceedings had obtained seats in conferences previously called to attain worthy ends. As a result, the declarations or resolutions of such conferences had not been looked upon as authoritative.

KELLAHER'S MEMORIAL DOWNED.

The formal procedure consisted of defeating the original Kellaher memorial praying Congress to pass the Ferris bill as it had been adopted by the House. The substitute resolution was thereupon taken up under suspension of the rules and adopted.

Perhaps the leading address on the resolution was delivered by Senator Thompson, who called Senator Farrell to the chair that he might speak from the floor. Senator Thompson warmly defended the resolution as not in any way discrediting Secretary Franklin K. Lane. Senator Thompson asserted his belief in Secretary Lane's friendship for the West, but declared him hampered by the influence and power of a combined East. He thought Secretary Lane would be the happiest man in the world if the Western States would unite to make plain the fact that they wanted no more Pinchotism.

MONOPOLY HERE IMPOSSIBLE.

Senator Thompson also pointed out that under the provisions of the Oregon water code and those of the Oregon public-utilities law, monopoly of Oregon water power was impossible; there was no need for Congress to withdraw water-power sites. Senator Butler characterized the Ferris bill as the most deadly blow ever struck at Oregon, and eloquently insisted that the State hold and maintain its water rights. The resolution asked only for a square deal in the eyes of Senator Moser, who referred to the resolution as urging a policy opposite from that of giving money paid for Oregon's good land to the development of reclamation projects in other States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to assure all Senators that if the leasing bill now on the calendar, or any other leasing bill, is proposed as an amendment to the Agricultural bill, I shall feel it my duty to interpose the point of order. This has been a most illuminating discussion, and I entreat Senators now to allow us to proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Chemistry," on page 43, line 12, after "$2,500," to strike out "one food and drug inspector" and insert "two food and drug inspectors, at"; in line 13, after "$2,250," to insert "each"; and in line 17, before the word "food," to strike out "four" and insert "two," so as to read:

Salaries, Bureau of Chemistry: One chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 3 executive clerks, at $2,000 each; 8 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,440; 12 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 20 clerks, class 1; 13 clerks, at $1,020 each; 13 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $960; 25 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; one food and drug inspector, $2,500; two food and drug inspectors, at $2,250 each; 13 food and drug inspectors, at $2,000 each; 13 food and drug inspectors, at $1,800 each; 1 food and drug inspector, $1,620; 11 food and drug inspectors, at $1,600 each; 2 food and drug inspectors, at $1,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "salaries, Bureau of Chemistry," on page 44, line 8, after the words "in all," to strike out "$291,540" and insert "$290,990."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 6, after the word "industry," to strike out "$40,000" and insert "$49,400," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the preparation for market, handling, grading, packing, freezing, drying, storing, transportation, and preservation of poultry and eggs, and for experimental shipments of poultry and eggs within the United States, in cooperation with the Office of Markets and Rural Organization and the Bureau of Animal Industry, $49,400;

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 19, to insert:

For investigating and testing the chemical and physical properties of leather and tanning materials, and for the study of tanning processes and the utilization of tannery by-products, $8,000;

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I remember correctly this same item was presented to the Committee on Appropriations at the time they had under consideration the sundry civil bill. I have just sent for a copy of the bill as it was printed for the use of the subcommittee to find out whether I am correct or not, but I feel positive that I am. The Committee on Appropriations had a hearing on this matter, the subcommittee as well as the full committee, and it was decided not to include in that bill this item for investigating and testing the chemical and physical properties of leather and tanning materials, and for the study of tanning processes, and the utilization of tannery by-products. I ask the Senator having the bill in charge what immediate necessity there is for this appropriation and why it was put in the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that this work has been conducted for some time by the department. The appropriation has been carried in a different item. This is merely to transfer it. I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture concerning this item if the Senator would care to hear it read.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like the Senator to have the letter read, because I do believe the time will come when we must have some kind of a system established in relation to our appropriation bills. If a department goes to one committee and fails to have an item adopted it should not go to another committee and have it adopted in an appropriation bill under the charge of that particular committee. If the Senator will have the letter read I shall be very glad.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to read it.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is what the Secretary of Agriculture has to say on the subject:

This item was stricken out on the floor of the House on a point of order. While it is new language, the project is not a new one, and the amount involved, $8,000, is merely a transfer from the appropriation for agricultural investigations, page 42, lines 10 to 12, inclusive, which has been reduced accordingly, and under which the work has heretofore been done. The reason given by Representative PAGE, who made the point of order, was that this work should be done in the Bureau of Standards. Last year the work of testing contract supplies was transferred to the Bureau of Standards. It was understood at that time, however, that the Bureau of Chemistry should continue the constructive work of developing the methods of making leather on a small scale on the farm. Mr. Page undoubtedly had reference to the testing of contract supplies made of leather goods. The work of the Bureau of Chemistry relates to agricultural industry in that it is developing methods by which the farmer can make small quantities of leather and includes also the utilization of products from the farm in tanning. No testing of contract supplies is contemplated under this item, and accordingly there will be no actual conflict between the work of the two bureaus. In the event the committee decides not to adopt the recommendation, it is urgently recommended that the sum involved, $8,000, be restored to the item for agricultural investigations, page 42, lines 10 to 12, inclusive.

It would seem that it does not add anything to the appropriation carried in the bill, but it provides simply another feature for investigating these tanning products, which it seems to me would prove to be quite a good deal of benefit perhaps to farmers and the people who have the products out of which tanning may be made. I know in my own State one source of that supply is what is known as scrub palmetto, which is said to make very excellent tanning material. I merely mention that. I do not know that it has any connection here, at least I do not know that the department proposes to investigate it down there at all. These various products it seems to me might be available if some investigations of this kind were made for the purpose of developing that industry.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Bureau of Standards desires an appropriation for this same purpose, and after listening to all they had to say, the Committee on Appropriations of the House refused to appropriate the amount for this specific purpose. They came before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and after listening to all that was said in relation to the needs for it, the committee decided that this item should not be put in the bill. Now we find it in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I would much prefer to have the bill read as it was before. If you want to transfer this item to the item suggested by the Department of Agriculture, let us do so, if it is necessary; but let us not in this bill undertake to enumerate everything that is to be accomplished under the lump-sum appropriation referred to by the Secretary of Agriculture. Whenever it is started, Mr. President, and it becomes an item of itself I notice that it never gets out of the appropriation bill. That is why this item is taken out of the lump sum and put into a particular item by itself.

Mr. President, this year it will be $8,000. Next year the item will be reported and increased perhaps to $10,000, and the next year to $15,000, and the next year to $20,000. I only say this because that is the usual policy followed. That has been the result in the past when items of this kind are mentioned in a paragraph by themselves for some particular purpose.

I will ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he is not satisfied to return to page 42 and increase the lump sum there $8,000 and allow this item to go out.

Mr. GORE. I may say that the Secretary suggested that it would be better to state explicitly the purpose for which the appropriation was made. I think there are some good arguments in favor of that course; but, on the other hand, I appreciate the force of the suggestion on the part of the Senator from Utah that when one of these investigations starts it never stops. There seems to be no subject investigated where any department is ever able to find out everything, and they go on forever. I have no serious objection to the transfer, and I will agree to it to facilitate the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The designation is wrong in the letter as applied to the bill as it is before us, but wherever the lump sum is stated in the bill, let it be increased $8,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. The letter, I think, refers to the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I noticed that in looking at the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. It can be inserted at the proper place where it belongs.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the insertion may be made at the proper place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. And then added to the lump sum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks in making up the totals will be instructed to add $8,000 to the lump sum at the proper place.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 1, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$139,680" and insert "$149,080."

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the total will be changed now, taking $8,000 out of the amount.

Mr. GORE. I should like at this place to ask unanimous consent to have the total changed to conform to the amendment made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 19, after the word "Chemistry," to strike out "$1,066,381" and insert "$1,075,231," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Chemistry, $1,075,231.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Entomology," on page 50, line 9, before the word "charwomen," to strike out "two" and insert "three," and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$69,050" and insert "$69,530," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Entomology: One entomologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,500; 1 chief clerk and executive assistant, $2,250; 1 financial clerk, $1,800; 3 clerks, class 4; 3 clerks, class 3; 9 clerks, class 2; 7 clerks, class 1; 7 clerks, at $1,000 each; 9 clerks, at $900 each; 2 entomological draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 1 entomological draftsman, $1,080; 4 foremen, at $1,080 each; 1 entomological aparators, at $840 each; 1 entomological preparator, $720; 2 entomological preparators, at $600 each; 6 entomological preparators, at $720 each; 1 messenger, $840; 2 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 4 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 mechanic, $840; 1 laborer, $540; 3 charwomen, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $240; in all, $69,530.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 13, after the word "Entomology," to strike out "$829,420" and insert "$829,900," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Entomology, $829,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 6, to insert:

For the improvement of the game preserve in Sullys Hill National Park, in the State of North Dakota, including the construction of all fences, sheds, buildings, corrals, roads, and other structures which may be necessary, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated, $10,000, the same to be available until expended.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if this same item which was appropriated a year ago was retained in the bill, or was it lost in conference?

Mr. WARREN. I do not see the Senator from North Dakota present, but I will state that it was lost in conference except a small amount.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 16, after the word "wolves," to insert "coyotes," and in line 19, after the word "marten," to strike out "$110,000" and insert "$300,000," so as to read:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in destroying wolves, coyotes, prairie dogs, and other animals injurious to agriculture and animal husbandry, and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $300,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I feel obliged to object to that item.

Mr. GORE. I will ask to have the item passed over, if that course is agreeable to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator wish to occupy any time on it?

Mr. THOMPSON. A few moments.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the chairman if it is his wish that it shall go over. Of course, it might as well be settled now as at any time, perhaps. I make no objection if the chairman wishes to have it go over.

Mr. GORE. I fear that the debate might run on and oblige us to stop the consideration of unobjected amendments, and I would not like to have that situation arise at this juncture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to having the amendment passed over?

Mr. GORE. I should like to insert a comma after the word "animals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. We are not agreeing to the appropriation of $300,000?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; simply the insertion of a comma. The Senator from Oklahoma, the Chair understands, requests that the amendment be passed over.

Mr. GORE. Yes; for fear that the discussion may develop the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 17, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$236,820" and insert "$436,820."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 18, after the words "Biological Survey," to strike out "$271,290" and insert "$471,290," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Biological Survey, $471,290.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Division of Publications," in the item of appropriation for salaries, Division of Publications, on page 57, line 2, after the word "each," to insert "one chief folder, $1,200," and in line 10, before the word "four," to strike out "two laborers, at $600 each," so as to read:

Four skilled laborers, at $780 each; 1 chief folder, $1,200; 16 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 1 folder, $1,000; 2 folders, at $900 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $1,100 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 2 messengers, at $720 each; 3 messengers or messenger boys, at $600 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $420 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 laborer, $840; 4 charwomen, at $480 each; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $174,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Library, Department of Agriculture," on page 59, line 26, after the word

"expenses," to strike out "$17,500," and insert "$16,300," so as to read:

General expenses, library: For books of reference, technical and scientific books, papers and periodicals, and for expenses incurred in completing imperfect series; for the employment of additional assistants in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for official traveling expenses, and for library fixtures, library cards, supplies, and for all other necessary expenses, $16,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 4, after the word "Library," to strike out "$47,220," and insert "$46,020"; so as to make the clause read:

Total for library, $46,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Miscellaneous expenses," on page 60, line 21, after "$115,000," to insert "of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

Miscellaneous expenses, Department of Agriculture: For stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, and matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, telephoning, postage, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings, grounds, and heating apparatus; for the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses and the purchase and repair of harness and vehicles, for official purposes only; for the payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the expense of the dispatch agent in New York; for official traveling expenses; and for other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for, and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the department, $115,000, of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, in charge of the bill, why the large amount of rent for buildings for the Department of Agriculture forms an item in this bill? A few years ago the Agricultural Department was confined to the old building. We then gave $1,000,000 to erect a new building. At that time they said that the new building would house everything that they had, and that they could dispose of the old building—could tear it down, because it was not very pretty and was in the Mall. Now they have both buildings; and I see here is a charge of $125,000 per year for rent. Will the Senator from Oklahoma tell me what it is for, and why it should be?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that this amount is the amount estimated by the department. I think they are just preparing to occupy one or two new buildings. Of course it is due to the expansion of the service in the Agricultural Department. I can not give any of the details in regard to the amount of space used.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What branches of the department are renting?

Mr. GORE. I think quite nearly all of them are. We made an effort at the last session, when the last appropriation bill was passed, to provide long-term leases, so as to reduce the rents, but it failed to meet the approval of the Senate and went out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to say this: The departments in this city are coming to us all the time to erect new buildings of a very fine character, architecturally ornate and impressive, but I do not find that they reduce their rental charges one particle when we construct such buildings.

The Department of Justice wants a building just now; the Department of State wants a building; the Department of Agriculture, before I left the other House, wanted this building. We gave them a million dollars; they have had the building quite a long while; and, as well as I can gather, they have not reduced their rental charges from what they were when they had only the old building.

I introduced a resolution of inquiry quite early in my term in the Senate—and I shall renew it at the beginning of the next session—to have the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds make an inquiry to discover how many of the departments are renting property in the District of Columbia, why they are renting it, who made the contracts; that is, what particular blood-and-flesh man, representing a department, actually negotiated the lease—not what departments made them, not what division or bureau made them, but what particular person made them—and why it is that the Government rentals are so high in this District, and whether or not those renting precisely the same sort of property to private individuals get less rent than when such property is rented to the Government. I understand that several divisions of the Agricultural Department are in rented buildings.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I can now furnish a detailed statement of the rent roll for the current year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. GORE. The appropriations for the fiscal year is a lump-sum appropriation. I send it to the desk, and ask to have the Secretary read it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RENT OF BUILDINGS, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia for use of the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture, namely:

For Bureau of Animal Industry, $2,220;
For Bureau of Plant Industry, $26,420;
For Forest Service, $25,075;
For Bureau of Chemistry, $17,320;
For Bureau of Soils, $306;
For Divison of Publications, $5,000;
For Office of Solicitor, $2,160;
For Office of Experiment Stations, $5,000;
For Office of Public Roads, $3,500;
For additional rent in cases of emergency for any bureau, division, or office of the department, $21,328;
In all, $108,329.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is a singular illustration of just what I was talking about. Not only is the Department of Agriculture renting buildings all over the District of Columbia, but all the various divisions of the Department of Agriculture are partially renting. They could not even put the Division of Animal Industry all in the public agricultural buildings which the Government owns; they could not even put all of the Plant Industry Division there; they could not even put all of the Forest Service there—in fact, I believe all of the Forest Service is outside of it; they could not put all of the Bureau of Chemistry there; they could not even put all of the Bureau of Soils there; they could not even house the Division of Publications there. They have got also to rent a special office for the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture. They could not even put all of the Experiment Station Office there; they could not even put all of the rooms for the Office of Public Roads there.

You would think that, if the department wanted to rent outside, they would rent some building for some special division instead of renting a part of 10 buildings for parts of 10 divisions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state the amount of rental that the office of solicitor calls for?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The rental for the office of solicitor is $2,160.

Mr. GALLINGER. It strikes me that that is an illustration of the fact that they are paying excessive rentals. The idea that a single office of a single individual should require $2,160 rental a year is preposterous.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think my colleagues here on both sides of the Chamber will bear me out in the claim I make that I am one of the least muckraking of all men in my disposition or in my temperament, but I am tired of this. I do not know how true it may be; I do not know whether or not it is true, but a friend of mine in the city of Washington, who did not want her name mentioned in connection with the matter, one day asked me, "Do you know what the Government is paying for this little property here?" I said, "No; I do not." She told me, and she said, "Right next door to it"—it was about where Gude's florist establishment was at that time, I believe—"private individuals are renting room almost just like it for one-fourth the amount of money." I do not know whether she was correctly informed or not, and I could not use her name, because what she was stating to me was upon information and not based on personal knowledge. In my private opinion there is a great deal of graft in this, and, as I suspect and fear, some "rake-off" to somebody representing the Government as actual negotiating agent. I do not mean in regard to these particular items; I do not know about them, but in my private opinion a great deal of this renting business is utterly useless. It reminds me of a man with five rooms to his house building four more rooms, and then finding after he is through that he has not any more room than he had before he built the four additional rooms. That frequently happens with a bad manager—when the woman of the household does not know how to manage things.

We have these two great wings there of the Agricultural Department Building, to be connected some of these days in the remote future by an ornamental passageway over the street, and perhaps with offices above the passageway; and we were assured, when the Agricultural Committee reported the appropriation to erect the building favorably to the House—and I was then the senior Democratic member of the Agricultural Committee in the House and Mr. Wadsworth, of New York, was chairman of that committee—we were assured at that time that not only would the new building accommodate the Department of Agriculture, but that it would enable us to remove from the Mall the old building, which is an eyesore, and which is not, architecturally speaking, a part of the general plan of the Mall at all, but is a disfigurement. Now, it turns out that here are ten different divisions of the Department of Agriculture renting all over this town.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to suggest to the Senator that there is now about to be torn down a splendid building adjoining the Capitol Grounds, called the Maltby Building——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was just going to come to that.

Mr. SHAFROTH (continuing). Belonging to the Government; and also a row of houses are to be torn down that could accommodate pretty nearly any department of the Government. It is of no use to tear them down; they are part of a park scheme; but they do not fit in with the park scheme.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was going to come to that after a bit.

Now, I hope that when the next session of Congress begins other Senators will aid me in probing this matter to the bottom. I do not refer especially to the Department of Agriculture; I have no reason to suspect anything particularly in connection with that department or with any other department; I have no information on which to base a charge of any sort; but it smells bad, it looks bad, it feels bad; and it seems to me that there is graft and perhaps "rake-off" in it somewhere along the line. I have been noticing for years that no matter what we build it seems to be to somebody's interest to see to it that the landlords of Washington rent the usual amount of property to the United States Government, and at very stiff prices, as this one item mentioned by the Senator from New Hampshire shows.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] said some time ago, Congress—I do not know just when; I do not remember now, but it was while I was in the House—passed a bill to condemn parts of 12 squares in the neighborhood of the Capitol. The part west of New Jersey Avenue they seem not to have condemned thus far. There was a provision in the bill, I think, to the effect that not over $500,000 should be expended in any one year in condemnation proceedings. They seem, therefore, thus far not to have condemned west of New Jersey Avenue, because I noticed lights shining in all the houses there to-night, showing occupancy. West of that avenue is the Maltby Building, upon the corner, and all those other buildings which now belong, or which will belong when condemned under the law, to the United States Government. Why can we not stop the condemnation right at New Jersey Avenue?

When the matter came up in the House it was then my function to object to unanimous consent for things, being minority floor leader. It was brought to me, and I said, "I am perfectly willing to have a vista between the new Union Railway Station and the Capitol. When visitors and tourists come to Washington I should like them from the station to see the Senate Office Building, the Capitol, and all that; but all you need in the world, instead of 12 squares, is the property between the Senate Office Building and the Union Station and the square just west of that;" and I thought it was arranged in that way. Somebody came to me and said, "The matter has been fixed the way you want it," and I did not know until I came to the Senate of the United States that these 12 squares had been condemned and put under an everlasting commission, which may never expire until the sun itself ceases to give light to the earth.

Why can we not in some way stop that, and why can not the Agricultural Department locate its force on that side of New Jersey Avenue, in the Maltby and the other buildings, if we do proceed with the condemnation and if the Government does buy that square? Why should we tear down the Maltby Building? Why should we tear down all these other buildings, when not only the Department of Agriculture but every other department is renting outside buildings somewhere?

Senators need not fool themselves. Instead of housing the State, War, and Navy Departments in one great building, if we were to construct a new building for the State Department, we would find it still renting. If you construct a great building for the Department of Justice, you will find it still renting. Somehow or other—I do not know why, but somehow or other—you can not unclasp the tentacles of the landlord interests here off of the Federal Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that there was not an appropriation of a half million dollars this year. A large appropriation was made two years ago to cover the entire balance of condemnation amounts. The law provided, if I remember correctly, that connected with this improvement there should be an avenue starting at the Peace Monument and ending on the axis in the center of the Union Station.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator mentioned that; that is one thing which I forgot. If there is anything in the world that ought not to be done, that is the thing. Do you know, if they run that avenue from the Union Station down to the Peace Monument, what it is going to do? It is going cut off a corner of the historic old Capitol Park Grounds close to the little grotto. It will cut off a corner there, and why? Just because somebody wants to draw a straight line, when it will be just as easy to skip it, and to leave the trees that were planted there in Jefferson's administration with the beautiful idea that there should be in the Capitol Grounds a representative of every sort of tree that was native to America that would grow in the grounds. There is the old spring, that was there before the Capitol was built, in that little grotto. How close the avenue will come to that I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. Not near it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it will cut off the corner just to the north of it or to the northwest of it. That is my information.

Mr. WARREN. It will take a trifle off the grounds to the northwest, I will say to the Senator, but not to the north.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I meant. It will take off that corner; and there is no reason why it should, and there is no reason under the sun why the Capitol Grounds, which are already so large that it takes the police force of an average city, in numbers at any rate, to take care of them, should be extended except for the purpose of opening a vista between the Union Station and the Capitol itself.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, I did not rise to take issue at all with the Senator with regard to what has been done. We have followed the law. We appropriated $500,000 each year for several years, and then appropriated for the remainder a lump sum, to acquire all the land which I understood it was intended to acquire.

Now, as to the Maltby Building, I think I was a Member of the Senate when it was purchased. It was purchased at a small figure, because at the time there was a rumor that it could not be rented for an apartment house because it was considered unsafe. However, we took the chances on that. Later on it was, if not officially condemned, at least condemned in the minds of a great many people, and I recall a great many fervid speeches made by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber—the Democratic side—in favor of constructing the great, extravagant, but elegant and satisfactory, building which we are now occupying as the Senate Office Building, because the Maltby Building was unsafe, and it was said that we had no right to keep Senators in an unsafe building. I myself occupied committee rooms on the third or fourth floor of the Maltby Building for several years and without fear, but some Senators seemed worried.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, unfortunately I too remember all that.

Mr. WARREN. Well, I thought that ought to go into the RECORD with the statement of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and we will put a little bit more into the RECORD. About that time the House constructed the House Office Building at a cost, I believe, of $3,800,000—I have forgotten the exact amount now.

They could have given each Member of Congress at that time, and his successors in perpetuity, a $10,000 home in Washington for the same amount. After they got the Office Building built it never did any particular good, but the chief effect of it was that it took twice as long to get a quorum into the House as it had taken previously to that time. Then the Senate said to itself: "Well, if the House is going to 'swell' like that, we want to swell a little, too; so we will spend $2,500,000." I believe it was, "to furnish offices for 96 men." You proceeded to do it; and in order to get popular approval—misled, perhaps, by experts; I do not know; men generally are—men did stand upon this floor and say that the Maltby Building was "unsafe"; it was "apt to fall down" overnight, as the Germans say. Why, from what they said, a man who went down there and die-

tated a letter ought to have gotten extra life insurance. And with all that this Senate got an excuse to build the Senate Office Building, costing two million and a half dollars, for offices for 96 men.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think it cost nearer $4,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was it $4,000,000?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I think the original appropriation was two and a half million dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Like most original appropriations, then, it grew by what it fed upon, to wit, itself.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the site did not cost two or three or four times as much as the estimate that was furnished upon which those figures were based when we made the appropriation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. However that may be, if they had confined the cost to the original estimate it would have been a very expensive piece of luxury for 96 men; but the excuse was that those Senators who had no offices in the Capitol and were in the Maltby Building were daily threatened with life extinction; and you built the Senate Office Building, and now we have so many offices that some Senators have five offices. I believe one committee has seven rooms for offices. The excuse, at any rate, was that the Maltby Building was about to fall down; and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who has been down there recently and inspected it, informs me that even now there is not a crack in it that he can discover from the basement to the roof. Is that correct?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I went all around the building, and I could not find a crack in the rear walls which would show whether or not there was a settling of the foundation, and nothing in the nature of a crack, except under sills or something of that sort, of minor importance, that is found on every building.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. If any Senator desires to offer an amendment to abolish the House and Senate Office Buildings, I will accept it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "States Relations Service," at the top of page 66, to insert:

That hereafter there be prepared by the Department of Agriculture an annual report on the work and expenditures of the agricultural experiment stations established under the act of Congress of March 2, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 440), on the work and expenditures of the Department of Agriculture in connection therewith, and on the cooperative agricultural extension work and expenditures of the Department of Agriculture and of agricultural colleges under the act of May 8, 1914, entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture"; and that there be printed annually 8,000 copies of said report, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the point of order against that amendment beginning in line 16, after the word "Agriculture," as follows—and that there be printed annually 8,000 copies of said report, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, that would conflict with the present law, the printing law, and it is clearly subject to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether this is a new item of appropriation or contrary to any existing law?

Mr. SMOOT. It went out in the House on a point of order. I do not want to make a point of order against the whole amendment, but I do make the point of order against the latter part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator desires to divide this amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the part of the amendment on page 66 to line 16 will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah what good this report will be if it is not printed?

Mr. SMOOT. It will be then in just exactly the same position as any other report. Under the printing law a certain number of copies of it will be printed; but this provision will not only interfere with our Rule XXIX, paragraph 2, but it will also interfere with the laws providing for the printing of public documents and reports. Therefore I make the point of order against the latter part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that this is not general legislation. Does the Senator from Utah make the point of order that it is general legislation?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I make the point of order that it is changing existing law.

Mr. GALLINGER. That point will not hold on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that under Rule XVI general legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill; but this is not general legislation, as the Chair understands. It is confined simply to the publication of one document.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; but the present law provides that a certain number of all of these documents shall be printed. Let me call attention also to Rule XXIX of the standing rules of the Senate, paragraph 2:

Motions to print additional numbers shall also be referred to the Committee on Printing; and when the committee shall report favorably the report shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof; and when the cost of printing such additional numbers shall exceed the sum of $500 the concurrence of the House of Representatives shall be necessary for an order to print the same.

Under the provisions of this law this could amount to more than $500. Under the standing rules of this body if it did, it would have to receive the sanction of the House of Representatives, and therefore would have to be referred to that body. This same point was raised and sustained in the House of Representatives.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I think possibly the Senator from Utah is under an erroneous impression in regard to this act. The act of April 27, 1904, provides for the publication of the reports of the Office of Agricultural Experiment Stations. The Agricultural bill last year authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to report a plan for the reorganization of the department. The House bill adopted the plan of reorganization proposed by the department under that reorganization. Under the plan of reorganization the name of the Office of Experiment Stations has been changed to the Office of State Relations; and there is a question as to whether or not this publication, already provided for by the act of April 27, 1904, could be done under the changed name of the office. It is to meet that situation that this amendment is proposed. It is not to provide for a new printing, as I understand, but to continue printing heretofore authorized and, I think, perhaps required by law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course it is not only changing the law providing that a certain number of copies shall be printed, as all other reports are provided for, but this provision states that "there shall be printed annually 8,000 copies of said report." I want to say to the Senator that there is no report of which that number of copies are allowed to be printed under the present printing law. This changes that law, and it is also in violation of paragraph 2 of Rule XXIX.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to have read the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion. It seems to me that these reports ought to be printed, and we ought to authorize them. It is not a question of the Senate merely doing it by an amendment of this kind. Of course this goes into the law, and Congress certainly has the right to authorize the printing of these reports. The law as it exists authorizes printing them as reports from experiment stations. Here we are considering the question of the States Relations Service reports, and it seems to me there ought to be some authority to print those reports. If the Senator makes the point of order against this item, there is no authority left to print these reports at all.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator certainly misunderstood me if he thinks that is the case, or else I did not explain myself clearly. The present law provides that a certain number of copies of the report of the department shall be printed; but the department is not satisfied with the regular number, but wants now 8,000 copies of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. In addition to the regular number? I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it does not say in addition to the regular number, nor do I think that it is in addition to the regular number, but it is 8,000 copies to take the place of the regular number.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to submit just one observation. The Senator from Utah says this item went out on a point of order in the House of Representatives. The Senator occupying the chair [Mr. SWANSON in the chair] knows that the rule in the House is very different from the rule in this body, and that a change of law is subject to a point of order in the House of Representatives. It is not in this body at all. I will further submit the suggestion that whatever the law may be regarding the printing of reports the Senate surely must have the power to provide for printing a larger number if it sees fit to do so.

I do not know whether this is wise or not; but to say that the Senate can not in its discretion and its wisdom provide for printing a larger number than is provided for in the case of ordinary documents strikes me as being rather remarkable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is satisfied——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, just a word.

Mr. GORE. I send to the desk the letter of the Secretary, which I should like to have read.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Utah should forego making the point of order on this amendment. This is a provision to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to print a report to show to the Senate and to the House of Representatives how successful the department has been in teaching the farmer how to farm.

I think the Senate will remember that when this law was passed about a year ago I called their attention to the fact that what the farmer needed more than anything else was a market. While I made no particular objection to an appropriation of money to assist the farmer or to teach the farmer how to farm, I insisted that there was a greater demand to help him to be able to distribute his products. We of the North do not happen to suffer this year, because we have produced an abundance of products that the world needs. You people of the South have produced so much cotton that you are unable to sell it. Consequently the price has declined, and the farmers of the South are suffering from it.

No business man, no matter whether he is engaged in manufacturing or in any other business, is going to produce so much or to throw so much of his product on the market that it will depress prices; but it is different with the farmer. I am simply taking the time of the Senate for just a moment to call attention to what I said when this law was enacted a year or two ago. The appropriation has not benefited the American farmer. It has not benefited the people of the South. It has not benefited the people of the North. I might just as well take the time of the Senate now to call attention to the fact that what we are in need of more than anything else is a system of marketing, or a system of distribution.

With the permission of the Senate, I wish to read a short article published in one of my home papers, the Walhalla Mountaineer. It is an article written by Peter Radford. Mr. Radford is the lecturer of the Farmers' National Union.

MARKETING WORLD'S GREATEST PROBLEM—WE ARE LONG ON PRODUCTION, SHORT ON DISTRIBUTION.

[By Peter Radford, lecturer National Farmers' Union.]

The economic distribution of farm products is to-day the world's greatest problem, and the war, while it has brought its hardships, has clearly emphasized the importance of distribution as a factor in American agriculture and promises to give the farmers the cooperation of the Government and the business men the solution of their marketing problem.

This result will, in a measure, compensate us for our war losses, for the business interests and Government have been in the main assisting almost exclusively on the production side of agriculture. While the Department of Agriculture has been dumping tons of literature on the farmer telling him how to produce, the farmer has been dumping tons of products in the Nation's garbage can for want of a market.

While that does not apply to the farmers this year, it did apply last year, and it will apply again just as soon as peace is established in Europe.

THE WORLD WILL NEVER STARVE.

At no time since Adam and Eve were driven from the Garden of Eden have the inhabitants of this world suffered from lack of production, but some people have gone hungry from the day of creation to this good hour for the lack of proper distribution. Slight variations in production have forced a change in diet, and one locality has felt the pinch of want while another surfeited, but the world as a whole has never been a land of plenty.

We now have less than one-tenth of the tillable land of the earth's surface under cultivation, and we not only have this surplus area to draw on, but it is safe to estimate that in case of dire necessity one-half the earth's population could at the present time knock their living out of the trees of the forest, gather it from wild vines, and draw it from streams. No one should become alarmed; the world will never starve.

The consumer has always feared that the producer would not supply him, and his fright has found expression on the statute books of our States and nations, and the farmer has been urged to produce recklessly and without reference to a market and regardless of the demands of the consumer.

BACK TO THE SOIL.

The city people have been urging each other to move back to the farm, but very few of them have moved. We welcome our city cousins back to the soil; and this earth's surface contains 16,092,160,000 idle acres of tillable land where they can make a living by tickling the earth with a forked stick; but we do not need them, so far as increasing production is concerned; we now have all the producers we can use. The city man has very erroneous ideas of agricultural conditions. The commonly accepted theory that we are short on production is all wrong. Our annual increase in production far exceeds that of our increase in population.

THE WORLD AS A FARM.

Taking the world as one big farm, we find 2,000,000,000 acres of land in cultivation. Of this amount there is approximately 750,000,000 acres on the western and 1,260,000,000 acres on the eastern hemisphere in cultivation. This estimate of course does not include grazing lands, forests, etc., where large quantities of meat are produced.

The world's annual crop approximates 15,000,0000,000 bushels of cereals, 13,000,000,000 pounds of fiber, and 65,000,000 tons of meat.

The average annual world crop for the past five years, compared with the previous five years, is as follows:

Past half decade.

Crops:
Corn	bushels	3,934,174,000
Wheat	do	3,522,769,000
Oats	do	4,120,017,000
Cotton	bales	19,863,899

Previous half decade.

Crops:
Corn	bushels	3,403,655,000
Wheat	do	3,257,526,000
Oats	do	3,508,315,000
Cotton	bales	17,541,200

The world shows an average increase in cereal production of 13 per cent during the past decade, compared with the previous five years, while the world's population shows an increase of only 3 per cent.

The gain in production far exceeds that of our increase in population, and it is safe to estimate that the farmer can easily increase production 25 per cent if a remunerative market can be found for the products. In textile fibers the world shows an increase during the past half decade in production of 15 per cent, against a population increase of 3 per cent.

The people of this Nation should address themselves to the subject of improved facilities for distribution.

During the reading of the article,

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator need not do that. I will be through in a minute, and the Senator can not take me off my feet.

Mr. JAMES. I did not mean to take the Senator off his feet. I merely intended to make a point of order that the point of order is not debatable; and, if it was, the Senator was not debating it. If he is going to get through soon, I will not insist upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order can not be debated under the rules of the Senate if it is insisted on.

Mr. JAMES. I will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood that my colleague asked the Senator from Utah to withhold his point of order, in order that he might make his statement, and I understood that was assented to.

Mr. GRONNA. I did make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Utah to withhold his point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Dakota will be through in a very few minutes.

Mr. JAMES. I say that I will not make the point of order as the Senator will be through in a moment. It is all right.

Mr. GRONNA. I am much obliged to the Senator from Kentucky.

After the reading of the article,

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say I do not think that this provision is subject to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to rule upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Chair indulge me a moment before ruling?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know how anxious the Chair is to rule, but I will guarantee not to take any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Kentucky has made a point of order that it is not debatable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I admit that it is not debatable, and I do not claim any right to proceed unless the Chair will say it is willing to hear discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is willing to hear the Senator from Connecticut, but the Chair has a definite conclusion on the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt the Chair has made up his mind irrevocably.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to withdraw the point of order and let it go into conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Being somewhat of a mind reader, I had an intuition myself, but I renew the point of order, and I make it on the whole paragraph; not the point of order on which the Chair has ruled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first part of the amendment has already been agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I can not do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not do that. Only the latter part has not been agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The point of order which the Senator from Utah made has been ruled upon by the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Chair had agreed to hear me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is willing to hear the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply want to say that clause 3 of Rule XVI provides that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I would not ask to be heard if I did not think this an important matter, because the Chair's ruling is liable to be cited as a precedent.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a question.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have the letter of the Secretary read before the Senator proceeds.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing to have the letter read if the Chair will recognize me afterwards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator on the point of order. The letter will be read.

Mr. GORE. I think this discussion ought to proceed in the light of the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

This provision was eliminated on the floor of the House on a point of order. The act of April 27, 1904 (33 Stat., 590), authorizes the printing of the report of the Director of the Office of Experiment Stations on the work and expenditures of that office and of the agricultural experiment stations. This is a permanent provision of law. In the bill the Office of Experiment Stations is converted into the States Relations Service. In view of this change it is doubtful whether the latter will be authorized to prepare the report in question. The language suggested makes no change in the substance of the act of 1904 except that it requires that the report incorporate an account of the activities and disbursements under the Lever Extension Act. The alterations in phraseology, in all respects except as just noted, are merely adaptations of existing law to the new proposed form of organization of the office formerly called the Office of Experiment Stations. The Lever Extension Act directs the Secretary of Agriculture to report to Congress annually the receipts, expenditures, and results of the cooperative agricultural extension work conducted in the various States thereunder.

It should be noted that the general printing bill which has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate contains a provision authorizing the printing of the report required by the act of 1904. We have requested the chairman of the Senate Committee on Printing to substitute the language suggested above for that included in the printing bill. In view of the uncertainty, however, as to when that bill will become a law, it is desirable that the department should have authority to continue the preparation of the report and to include therein the activities and disbursements under the Lever Extension Act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection whatever to giving the department authority to continue the work or to make a proper report about its successes, but my point is as to the rule of the Senate, whether the legislation providing for this very commendable purpose can be put upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. President, this bill proceeds to appropriate the sums named therein for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916. It is simply an appropriation bill appropriating money and defining the purposes for which it shall be used. This proposes to place on it as an amendment, on page 66, language in part as follows, "that hereafter," which contemplates the making of a law for all time, not for the fiscal year to which the bill applies itself, but "hereafter" there shall be "prepared by the Department of Agriculture an annual report," and it goes on specifying it, and the latter part of the amendment, after it was subdivided, provides "that there be printed annually" every year. This is simply an appropriation bill for this year.

Mr. President, if the language, on page 66, from line 1 to line 20, inclusive, is not general legislation, I do not know general legislation when I see it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I do not know whether the Senator heard the statement which I previously made. The act of April 27, 1904, required this report to be prepared by the director of the experiment stations. The name of that office has been changed to the office of State relations, and that is the occasion for this amendment. It is that the report can be made in the name and by the authority of the new office under the name it now bears. I understand it is no alteration in the law of 1904, which designated the office as the Office of Experiment Stations.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not increase the number now provided by law. It is the same number.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have not based my point of order upon the fact that this changes existing law or is an increase in the number of employees or attempts to do anything different from the existing law. That is not a point of order in the Senate, as I understand it, but it would be a point of order under the House rules. My point of order is that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill; and it is not only general legislation, but it provides what shall be done each year annually after all the provisions of this bill have been complied with and the appropriation is expended. It is a clear case of legislation. If it is not legislation it is nothing. It is certainly general legislation. The fact that it pertains to this particular department does not make it less general legislation. The appropriation bill itself is legislation. It is not general legislation; it is a law appropriating money, and in that sense it is legislation. As I understand it, the intent of the Senate rule is that upon these legislative bills, designed simply to carry appropriations of money, there shall not be legislation of this character.

That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the part that has been agreed to is general legislation. The latter part of the amendment is a provision to print a specific report. It does not contemplate changing any general printing law and it is an item that is recommended by a standing committee of the Senate. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order under the rules of the Senate, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The fact that it was reported by a committee does not make it less liable to the objection that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it is not general legislation. The Chair is of opinion also that it is a specific item reported, and it is in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not wish to do anything to impede the progress of this bill; far less to suggest any question about a quorum. If I appeal from the decision of the Chair and that appeal can lie, to be acted upon when there is a quorum here some time, I am perfectly willing that should be done, but I do not want to lose my right of appeal simply out of my desire to have progress made upon the bill.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the appeal. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. JAMES. The appeal could be submitted without a yea and nay vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would have to ask for the yeas and nays. I do not do this in any captious spirit, and I do not want to break up the meeting. I understand that certain provisions of the bill have gone over until to-morrow anyway.

Mr. GORE. I will state that no item has gone over until to-morrow. One or two have been passed over. I ask the Senator if he would object to the passing over this for the present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand the last request.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator if he would object to the passing over of this amendment for the present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Except we could not have the yeas and nays, I assume, without disclosing the lack of a quorum. Otherwise, I would have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should have to do so. I do not make that demand now, unless it is necessary to protect myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he would not be willing to let it go over like several other propositions in the bill and let us go on with the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have said I would desire to do that, but I was informed that it was objectionable.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe anybody would object to letting it go over the same as the other amendments went over.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what the Senator from Oklahoma asked, that the Senator from Connecticut allow it to go over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would be delighted to have that course adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the matter going over? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I can call attention now to a matter that I wanted to refer to on page 63, which was passed over. The reading was so rapid that it was passed before I knew it. However, I will wait until the bill is through, and then I will refer back to page 63.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering," on page 69, after line 12, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the existence of artesian water and other underground water supplies suitable for irrigation in the arid and semiarid regions by boring wells, $100,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "Agriculture," in line 13 the words "in conjunction with the Geological Survey," so that it will read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in conjunction with the Geological Survey, to investigate—

And so forth.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I simply want to call attention to the fact that in the sundry civil appropriation bill there is a provision which reads as follows:

For gauging streams and determining the water supply of the United States, the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells, and the preparation of reports upon the best methods of utilizing the water resources, $150,000.

In other words, Mr. President, the sundry civil appropriation bill already contains an appropriation of $150,000 for this purpose along with some other purposes, and it is not limited to underground currents, but it also includes the gauging of streams and determining the water supply of the United States. While that includes some other matters, it includes the same purposes contained in the clause now under consideration.

So we find that this legislation is establishing in two separate departments the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells. The Agriculture Department is not equipped for such an investigation. The provisions in the sundry civil bill leaves this investigation to the Geological Survey, which is equipped for investigations of this sort and is now conducting such investigations.

It is true the Senator from Nebraska claims that the Geological Survey is not doing work in the arid regions, but in the sundry civil bill as it now stands, having passed really both Houses and will certainly become a law, there is an appropriation of $150,000 embracing this very purpose. So we have two departments of the Government, one equipped for this work and the other not equipped for it, both carrying on these investigations. It is a plain duplication of the work.

I think it is most unfortunate legislation. I can not conceive of any good to come from legislation of the kind. It seems to me if the $150,000 was not sufficient for this purpose, the amount ought to have been increased in the sundry civil appropriation bill and the proper department of the Government—the Geological Survey—required to expend the money in the arid region, if not expending it as it ought to do, proportionately in that region. I simply call attention to it. I think it is very bad legislation. It is practically a duplication of work and intrusting work to a department not equipped for executing it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Virginia, I move that the provision now under consideration in the Agricultural appropriation bill be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Colorado that this is an amendment proposed by the committee. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the question is——

Mr. THOMAS. If I can make a point of order against it I will do that.

Mr. NORRIS. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by me to the committee amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not want to make a point of order that will take the Senator off his feet.

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, I do not believe it is subject to a point of order, but I want to be heard upon the proposition. Will the Senator from Virginia tell me the page upon which that particular item in the sundry civil bill was contained?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was on page 101, I will say to the Senator. I will send the bill over to him, if he has not a copy of it before him.

Mr. NORRIS. What the Senator from Virginia has said is true. There may be an unfortunate condition here, and I have a great deal of sympathy with the desire of the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to have these various appropriations made in such way that they will not be conflicting. However, I think I shall be able to show that the conflict is more apparent than real. I would have no objection, as I said to the Senator from Virginia, who very kindly called my attention to this matter, it having been called to his attention by a letter from the Geological Survey, if the matter could have been put in the sundry civil bill in such a way that it would insure the investigation provided for in the pending bill. I do not believe, if the amendment I have offered be adopted, that there will be any conflict or any duplication or any lack of harmony in the work. Let me now read this item in the sundry civil bill to which the Senator from Virginia has called our attention. It reads as follows:

For gauging streams and determining the water supply of the United States, the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells, and the preparation of reports upon the best methods of utilizing the water resources, $150,000.

Mr. President, that is an item that has been in the sundry civil bill, I think, for a great many years. The amount appropriated is not the same, I think, but is increased a little this year. The Geological Survey have always complained that the amount appropriated in the item was not sufficient to do the work. They have never yet expended one penny, and do not intend to expend one penny, of that appropriation for the purposes named in this amendment in the Agricultural bill.

Mr. President, useful as it is, and important as it is, the particular item that we are invited to examine by the Senator from Virginia in practical effect has nothing whatever to do with irrigation or the development of irrigation in the arid or semiarid West. They are gauging streams; they will use some of that money perhaps in gauging the Potomac River; they can bore artesian wells in Virginia or in New York or in Maine; they can investigate the underground currents in Ohio or in Indiana or in California.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. The particular thing that I want, however, to accomplish in the provision in the Agricultural bill is to go into the arid and semiarid West and develop irrigation by the boring of artesian wells.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska in reference to this item in the sundry civil bill, that I do not know how the Geological Survey now interprets the language of that appropriation, but I know a few years ago they held that they did not have authority under the language to bore artesian wells. I do not know whether they now hold that under that language they have a right to actually bore wells. If they do, then something might be accomplished under it, but a few years ago they did hold that the language did not authorize them to bore wells. Their investigation was then a sort of theoretical investigation. As the Senator from Nebraska has stated, there never has been a well bored.

Mr. NORRIS. And there never will be under that item.

Mr. JONES. And there never will be one bored under that appropriation.

Mr. NORRIS. Not one; but, Mr. President, they used most of this money for gauging streams. I am not belittling the work they do under this appropriation. It is important for various purposes that we should know the flow of all the streams of the United States.

I am going to read the language as it would read if my amendment were adopted:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in conjunction with the Geological Survey, to investigate the existence of artesian water and other underground water supplies suitable for irrigation in the arid and semiarid regions by boring wells, $100,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would the Senator from Nebraska accept an amendment, inserting the words "to explore for and investigate"?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection to that language.

Mr. PITTMAN. I only suggest that out of precaution, because, as has been stated, as the language has heretofore been interpreted by the department, they held they had no authority to explore.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; the Senator from Nevada is mistaken. This language has never heretofore been used in the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I refer to the sundry civil bill.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not now amend that bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; but I was suggesting that we insert in this bill the words "explore for and investigate."

Mr. NORRIS. The language of this amendment reads "by boring wells." I do not know, but I should think that would be sufficient, although I would not have any objection to the language which the Senator suggests.

Mr. PITTMAN. All right. It was only a suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this appropriation is for a specific purpose. If you increase the appropriation in the sundry civil bill by adding another hundred thousand dollars to it, unless you also add language which would compel its use for the specific purpose, there would not be a cent used for this purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator will permit me for just a moment, I want to call attention to and to read an extract from a letter received by me from the Director of the Geological Survey, in which, so far from claiming that he did not have a right to use the money for the purpose which the Senator's amendment provides that it shall be used, he says that he has the right and that he has for years been using it for that purpose in the West. I will read exactly what he says.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He says:

> I do wish to bring to your attention the fact that, in my opinion, such an appropriation could be better made available by a service already organized for this special line of investigation, and which, in fact, as far as its appropriations have permitted, has been carrying on such work for many years in the West.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, now, Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. They have never yet sunk a well.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator from Virginia that, as near as I know, without being present and having personal knowledge of it, I do know that in all the years they have been working under the item noted they have never yet bored a single well.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should be glad to have the entire letter printed in the RECORD. I did not read it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
> UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
> Washington, February 20, 1915.
> Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
> Chairman Committee on Appropriations.
> MY DEAR SENATOR MARTIN: In connection with the Agriculture appropriation bill as reported to the Senate I note the committee amendment, page 99, line 13:
>
> "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the existence of artesian water and other underground water supplies suitable for irrigation in the arid and semiarid regions by boring wells, $100,000."
>
> This is in large part a duplication of the authority granted the Geological Survey for a number of years and repeated in the language contained in the sundry civil bill as reported to the Senate, page 101, line 12:
>
> "For gauging streams and determining the water supply of the United States, the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells, and the preparation of reports upon the best methods of utilizing the water resources, $150,000."
> The Geological Survey, however, is without adequate appropriations to carry on as much of this work as I realize is needed. The estimates this year provided for an increase of $50,000 in this appropriation, and as you may remember, last year an amendment increasing this item was offered to the sundry civil bill and carried in the Senate, but was objected to by the House conferees.
> Realizing, as I do, the need of increasing the utilization of the ground water in the arid and semiarid regions, I would not care to object to any appropriation made therefor, but I do wish to bring to your attention the fact that, in my opinion, such an appropriation could be better made available by a service already organized for this special line of investigation, and which, in fact, as far as its appropriations have permitted, has been carrying on such work for many years in the West. In this connection you may be interested to refer to the discussion of the matter in the Senate last year by Senator NORRIS and others in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 7, 1914. (Pages 11702–11704, bound RECORD.)
> Yours, very cordially, GEO. OTIS SMITH.
> Director.

Mr. NORRIS. This appropriation has been used and for the purposes named, and that is, as specified in the law here, for gauging streams and determining the water supply of the United States. They do that mostly by gauging streams. As I have said, I do not belittle the work of the Geological Survey, but I know that several years ago, on my personal request made of the officials, they refused to expend any of that money for this particular purpose. The reasons they gave were that they were using it for the purpose of gauging streams and that they did not have enough money to do the work. They were trying to cover the whole of the United States. They pointed out the importance of the work, which I readily conceded. I believe in the last appropriation bill they only had a hundred thousand dollars for that purpose—if I am wrong, the Senator from Virginia can correct me—and that they have asked and have received an additional appropriation in the bill of this year for that purpose.

Mr. President, I do not want any duplication; I only want to bring about the possibility of making some of the arid and semiarid regions of the West useful for agricultural purposes. No one is asking the Government to bore for him an artesian well, or any other kind of a well, but there are communities and vast stretches of country in the West and semiarid West that can not at the present time be irrigated from any known supply. It is expensive to put down an artesian well. The people living in those sections of the country are always poor. It is a new country, and no man there can afford to bore a well and run the risk of losing all the money he should put into it; but if he knew that he could get artesian water in a sufficient amount to irrigate his farm he would have no trouble in getting money to bore his own well.

The object of this particular item is for the Government, after making the proper investigation through the Geological Survey, to go into a community where, as a result of the study of the Geological Survey, they have reason to believe that artesian water can be had, and put down a well. When it is established that there is artesian water in sufficient quantities to irrigate, evey man in the community will bore his own well at his own expense and will irrigate his own land. Thus we should make valuable and useful large areas of land that are now a desolate waste.

I remember not long ago receiving a resolution through the mails from a meeting of cattlemen and farmers living in the semiarid West. To that meeting delegates had been sent from a large area of surrounding country, comprising four or five different counties, to discuss methods by which they might get together and put down test wells in different portions of that locality with a view of getting water to irrigate their lands.

Here is an instance, it seems to me, where the Government could utilize its money by making an experiment for the public good. It strikes me that there is not an appropriation in this bill, Mr. President, that can more properly be spent to bring about good results than the appropriation contained in this amendment which is designed to try to get water for irrigation purposes in communities that are now arid or semiarid.

To show you, Mr. President, that such a provision is not out of place in the Agricultural appropriation bill, let me read the item that immediately precedes this in the bill. It is as follows:

> For investigating and reporting upon the utilization of water in farm irrigation, including the best methods to apply in practice; the different kinds of power and appliances, and the development of equipment for farm irrigation; the flow of water in ditches, pipes, and other conduits; the duty, apportionment, and measurement of irrigation water; the customs, regulations, and laws affecting irrigation; for the purchase and installation of equipment for experimental purposes; for the giving of expert advice and assistance; for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation; for the employment of assistants and labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for rent outside of the District of Columbia; and for supplies and all necessary expenses, $106,400.

Then follows the amendment under discussion. It seems to me it is absolutely appropriate, although I know that what the Senator from Virginia has said is true, that the Geological Survey is the branch of the Government service, above all others, which is equipped for this kind of work; and therefore I have offered an amendment to the amendment. It occurred to me when the Senator from Virginia was kind enough to call it to my attention before we reached it, knowing that I was interested in the subject, that there ought to be some amendment of the kind I have suggested.

I ought to pause here to refer to the letter from which the Senator from Virginia has read as coming from the Geological Survey. That service wants to do the work, and, I believe, in this case properly so. I think it is proper for them to be considered, although it seems to me the Secretary of Agriculture should have supervision over it, because it comes peculiarly within his province and under his duties. Yet we ought not to forget that this very objection is called to our attention by another bureau, illustrating very well that the bureaus and departments of the Government, located side by side in Washington, are jealous of each other. One looks over the agricultural bill and says, "Here is something that we ought to have," and writes a letter to a Senator, calling attention to the fact that they ought to have that money to expend—in this case, I think, with some reason—but it is at least proper for the Senate to consider, if they have any idea that they ought to give much weight to the letter of the Geological Survey, that it is an attempt of that bureau to get more money which they think might be expended through some other bureau. I believe they are the best equipped, and it seems to me the Secretary of Agriculture, although in a different department of the Government, can, if this amendment is adopted in the amended form in which I have suggested, make use of the scientific knowledge and the great experience of the scientists in the Geological Survey to utilize their experts and use a portion of this money with which to do it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I want to call the Senator's attention to the estimate, which has been submitted for the item, of $150,000, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, taken from the Book of Estimates.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. JONES. On page 799 of the Book of Estimates I find the estimates for gauging streams, determining water supply, and here they are. Every one of them is an estimate for an officer and his salary, and nothing at all is estimated for machinery or for the operation of machinery or for the hiring of help to sink a well or anything of the kind:

1 hydraulic engineer	$4,000
1 hydraulic engineer	3,600
4 hydraulic engineers, at $2,700 each	10,800
3 hydraulic engineers, at $2,400 each	7,200
1 assistant engineer	2,160
3 assistant engineers, at $1,980 per annum each	5,940
7 assistant engineers, at $1,800 per annum each	12,600
9 assistant engineers, at $1,620 per annum each	14,580
11 junior engineers, at $1,380 per annum each	15,180
13 junior engineers, at $1,200 per annum each	15,600
9 junior engineers, at $1,080 per annum each	9,720
1 chemist	2,400
1 junior chemist	1,200
1 assistant geologist	1,980
1 assistant geologist	1,380
1 geologic aid	1,200
1 geologic aid, at $100 per month	1,200
1 senior clerk	1,800
1 junior clerk	1,380
1 junior clerk	1,320
2 junior clerks, at $1,200 per annum each	2,400

1 underclerk	900
1 underclerk	840
2 underclerks, at $720 per annum each	1,440
1 messenger boy	360

He might sink some artesian wells.

One hydraulic engineer	$2,700
One junior engineer	1,440
One junior engineer	1,200
One assistant classifier	1,320
One junior clerk	1,320
Two underclerks, at $1,080 per annum each	2,160
One messenger	720
One accountant	1,800
One purchasing clerk	1,680
One clerk	1,680
One junior clerk	1,320
One underclerk	1,020
One underclerk	720
One messenger	720
Two messenger boys, at $360 per annum each	720
Two charwomen, at 82½ cents per day (300 days each)	495

Mr. NORRIS. I expect it is the charwomen.

Mr. JONES. I expect so.

Mr. NORRIS. Because they would have some shovels, very likely.

Mr. JONES. The total estimate is $156,115. Now, here is what they want this money for. I do not see where they will get any artesian wells put down there with people like that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How many underclerks are there altogether?

Mr. JONES. I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me it well illustrates that between that item in the sundry civil bill and this one there can be no real controversy. They are not duplications, although, as I said at the beginning, if the other bill had contained a provision that would compel the use of this money I would just as soon have it there as here, and I would a little rather, because I know it would suit the Senator from Virginia better to have it that way, and it would be more logical.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. I have not the least desire in the matter. I simply brought it to the attention of the Senate in the interests of good legislation. It is a matter of no consequence to me which department uses it. I simply wanted to get before the Senate the condition that existed.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I want to do. It seems to me that I have done that in the best way I can, and it seems to me I have shown that if we are going to do this work, if we want it done, we must adopt this amendment; that under the sundry civil bill we will get nothing. We might have managed it if we had it before us now; but it has passed the House, and the Senate has voted on it, and it is now in conference, and it is too late to amend it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator from Virginia that it would have been better to have put this amendment in the sundry civil bill. I think last year we put an amendment of that character in that bill, but it went out in conference. Now, unless we have this provision as presented here in the Agricultural bill we will have nothing for demonstrating the supply of artesian water, because the appropriation under the sundry civil bill is not used for that purpose. It never has been used for that purpose in the way of sinking wells, and it never will be used for that purpose until we appropriate a sum of money for that specific purpose.

I have read the estimates here, which show what this money is for. They investigate the matter of artesian water supply from a scientific standpoint. I remember, Mr. President, that I stated, when the sundry civil bill was up before, that several years ago in North Yakima, where I live, they made an investigation under the sundry civil bill to see whether or not artesian water could be secured. They reported that it could not be secured. By and by some man who had a little more money than some of his neighbors and had some land that he wanted irrigated, and who from his practical observation thought there might be artesian water there, went and sank a well, and at a depth of about a thousand feet he struck artesian water. He got enough artesian water out of that well to irrigate 160 acres of land, and to-day there are 20 or 30 artesian wells in that section, all of them being used for the irrigation of land. The scientific investigators said that there was not any such thing as artesian water there. The actual demonstration, by sinking a well, showed that there was and is artesian water there.

That is the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. We want to actually demonstrate and determine whether or not there is artesian water in a certain section. You can not do it under the appropriation in the sundry civil bill unless you make a specific appropriation for that purpose and put it in the hands of these men. We have plenty of men in the Geological Survey to do this work if we would just give them the money for that purpose and authorize them to hire the necessary ordinary labor to go to work and get the spades and machinery and sink the wells, but we have not provided for that in the sundry civil bill, and unless you adopt this provision you will not have anything of that kind done.

The Senator from Nebraska well pointed out the importance of it, and the illustration that I have just used in reference to my own home locality illustrates the importance of it and what can be accomplished. As he has said, if the Government sinks one artesian well in a certain locality, and artesian water is found, that is all the Government has to do. The people owning the lands around there will then sink the other wells. They will reclaim their lands, irrigate them, and develop them. That is what we would like to do. That is what would be done under the amendment the Senator from Nebraska has offered, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If these artesian wells are as expensive as the Senator from Nebraska intimates, if you have to go down a thousand feet in order to make a test, as the Senator from Washington says, even if the $150,000 in the sundry civil bill could be used, together with the sum attempted to be appropriated in this bill, it would be none too much to make a respectable beginning, considering the amount of territory to be covered; because if this policy of the Government is to be adopted, it must be pretty generally adopted, and the amendment proposes to cover the arid and semiarid regions of the West, which, I think, is a fairly extensive territory. So if this sum here, $100,000, should be adopted as a beginning, even if the sum referred to by the Senator from Virginia could be used also for the same purpose, I do not think it would be an excessive appropriation, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I want to add just a word of testimony in corroboration of what has been said by the Senator from Nebraska, as well as by the Senator from Washington, in regard to the great need there is for an appropriation of this kind for the purpose of sinking artesian wells and demonstrating whether or not an artesian-well supply can be obtained for irrigation purposes and for other domestic uses.

West of the Missouri River, in the State of South Dakota, is a part, at least, of the Great Plains country, a vast semiarid region. That region has been settled largely since 1905 or 1906 under various acts of Congress opening the Indian reservations. It has been settled by homesteaders, who bought their lands of the Government at an average price of about $4 per acre, there being thus something of a Government guaranty that the lands were cultivable lands and could be relied on for the production of crops. In addition to the Government's course in opening these lands and having them appraised at these prices, there were, of course, the advertisements of the railroad companies and the advertisements of the land and real estate people inducing the settlers to go to that section, where now for four successive years they have had crop failures, partial or total, due to want of sufficient rainfall.

The country east of the Missouri River contains within it what is known as the James River Valley, running north and south through central South Dakota. It is one of the famous artesian-well sections of the world. I think, perhaps, it is the most famous, more famous than that region in Artois, France, from which the name "artesian" comes; and the wells first sunk there, many of which were 4½-inch wells or over, had a pressure of 125 to 160 pounds per square inch. The water came with such force that we needed no other or further fire protection in the towns where those wells were put down than the artesian wells themselves. Now, it is supposed that the source of that water—it was then, and I think it is yet the theory—is the Rocky Mountain region beyond, and that it came from the rains and the melting snows percolating down through the strata until it found its place from 850 to 1,200 feet beneath the surface there in the James River Valley, and then, when the well was sunk, the waters gushed forth with that tremendous force. If the Rocky Mountains are the source, the fact that they lie on beyond these semiarid regions in the western part of the State suggests this as one of the great fields in the country for exploration on the part of the Government for the purpose of demonstrating whether water may be found there which can be brought to the surface in quantities sufficient for irrigation purposes.

Mr. President, in view of what the Government has done to induce the settlement of that country, it can do no less than to afford every opportunity within its proper power to help those who are there in the development of the resources of that country, so that they will be enabled to make and maintain their homes in that region. It has been shown here, I think, by what has been cited from the estimates heretofore made, that there will be no duplication of the work provided for in the sundry civil bill and in the present bill, because heretofore they have been doing none of the work covered by the provision in this bill. There is this great field in western South Dakota, and I have not known of the Agricultural Department or of the Geological Survey attempting any work in exploring for artesian wells in all that region, inviting as the field seems to be.

I think this amendment should prevail.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will take up none of the time of the Senate. I simply desire to say that I hope the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be adopted. There is no question among western men—that is, men in the arid States—of the importance of legislation of this character. We only regret that the appropriation is not much larger than it is.

The statement of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is true. It is a mere pittance. It will only start the work, and if it were not for fear of embarrassing this bill I would offer an amendment to increase the amount. It would only be a start. I trust that the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 70, line 16, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$497,700" and insert "$610,505."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 17, after the word "Engineering," to strike out "$573,660" and insert "$686,465," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering, $686,465.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Before the good-roads section of the agricultural bill is passed I wish to correct an intimation that was thrown out yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. He criticized some experimental roads which had been made in Maryland by this branch of the Agricultural Department. I wish to state that the work he referred to was done at a time when I was in close observation of it, some years ago, under a Republican administration. It was entirely well done and properly done; but the Bureau of Roads had a certain fund for experimentation purposes, and several very difficult pieces of construction had been attempted by our State roads commission. One section of a road that had cost $14,000 had disappeared in less than a year under heavy traffic and unusual subbase conditions. That and another section of road were opened for experimental purposes. The Agricultural Department people offered to experiment on these roads in Maryland if the local authorities would double their money; and so, by the action of the county authorities and local subscription, the Government money was doubled as available for these experiments, and expended there in that way. Although part of the road was a great deal more expensive than was necessary for local purposes, yet for experimental purposes it seemed proper to make it in the way that the department concluded to construct it.

The whole transaction was very much to the interest of the experimental purpose of the Agricultural Department and was incidentally beneficial to a very worthy portion of the neighborhood of the Capital City.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to state to the Senator from Maryland that whatever experience his State may have had in experimental road building, Maryland deserves the admiration of everybody for the system of roads she has built in recent years. In my opinion, there is no State that has done any better work than Maryland in that direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Office of Markets and Rural Organization," on page 71, after line 19, to insert:

Experiments in dairying and live-stock production in semiarid and irrigated districts of the western United States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct investigations and experiments in problems connected with the establishment of dairying and meat-production enterprises on the semiarid and irrigated lands of the western United States, including the purchase of live stock, the erection of barns and other necessary buildings, and the employment of necessary persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $87,500.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask precisely what the significance of the term "western United States" is? I see it says "semiarid and irrigated lands of the western United States." That is a new term.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in answer to that I will say that there is where the semiarid regions for the most part are found—in western United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the term is correct. It struck me as being a new term, however—"western United States."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Before this item is agreed to I should like to ask the Senator to what extent this appropriation is to be used for the purchase of live stock, and where that live stock is to be located when purchased, and what we are to do with it?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I am not able to answer the question from the terms of the amendment; but my understanding is that very little or none will be apportioned to that purpose. The object is to conduct experiments, I suppose, using largely the stock furnished by the settler. The general theory was that it would be greatly to the advantage of the settlers on the irrigated lands if they could convert their hay and other materials into stock and dairy products and market them in that form, and no effort is being made at present to carry on experiments or demonstrations of that sort. The Government is conducting demonstrations in various parts of the country upon an extensive scale, and appropriating a great deal of money for that purpose, and it was deemed but fair to these settlers, who perhaps more than any other single class need this particular service. It seems to me to be a highly important provision.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not complaining about the object of the amendment. Out of this appropriation of $87,500 the department is to pay for "the employment of necessary persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere." Does the Senator know how much of this would be spent for the payment of clerks here in Washington and how much would be paid for employees and persons engaged in this work in other parts of the United States, and also if the purchase of live stock is to be for the purpose of experimenting with them upon the products that are raised in the arid and semiarid parts of our country?

Mr. GORE. I suppose the experimental and demonstration work will be largely of the same character as the work that is conducted in other parts of the country, extending to the irrigation regions. I will have read a letter from the department upon this subject. It discloses the various purposes for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the letter is read I want to say that this bill is growing on some of us and becoming more interesting than some novels I have read. We are now going to make an appropriation for the arid and semiarid regions of the United States, and spend the people's money for the purpose of experimenting in live stock. After we have taken care of the arid and semiarid regions we turn to page 79 and then go to sugar cane and cotton districts of the United States and make experiments and demonstrations there in reference to live stock.

I wish that the Senators who framed this bill would not forget that there is a little rocky "neck of the woods" in this country called New England, and on our mountain slopes, and the foothills of our beautiful mountains there is a vast deal of grazing land that might be occupied for experimental demonstrations in the raising of live stock, and we would like to have the Government go into the business there.

While I am not going to oppose these appropriations, notwithstanding they look to me as being rather absurd, yet I will bespeak for New England, for New Hampshire as an illustration, in the preparation of the next appropriation bill a little thought on the part of the committee. If the members of the committee will accompany me to that part of the country, I should like to point out to them the splendid opportunities which are there for raising cattle and horses, if you please, and other live stock at the expense of a paternal Government, which seems to be taking care of the West and the South to the exclusion or the neglect of the northern section of the country.

In one of these amendments we have the western United States. Now, let us go to the northern United States and see if we can not do a little missionary work there in this direction.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will simply say, in response to what the Senator has observed, that if New Hampshire or New England failed to receive anything to which they are entitled it was a mere oversight on the part of the very distinguished and active Senator, and I will join the Senator in rectifying the wrong. I ask that the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, to which I referred, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This item was submitted in our estimates, but was not approved by the House committee. The work proposed under this item will be directed toward securing results of an extremely practical nature, particularly in regard to the establishment of animal industries in our dry-land regions of the West. I regard it as extremely important in view of the diminishing meat supply of the country.

The field stations of the department in the semiarid and irrigated districts of the United States have in the past been devoted almost entirely to the production of crops. Methods have been established on these stations that make it possible now to produce forage crops in these districts with a considerable degree of success, but such crops are not marketable for the reason that in most cases there are no near-by cities and there is no demand for them in the immediate neighborhood in which they are produced. The profitable utilization of these crops on the farm, therefore, is essential to successful farming in these regions. For the purpose of establishing proper methods of feeding, along with the natural grazing that is afforded, it is the desire of the department to place live stock at several of the field stations in the semiarid and irrigated districts of the United States and thereby make the production of field crops profitable and at the same time increase the production of live stock. If this work is provided for, attention will be given both to dairying and meat production, and this will make these field stations serve as guides to the farmers in these regions not only in crop production but also in the profitable utilization of these crops for the production of live stock.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 3, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$352,650" and insert "$440,150."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 18, after the word "Organization," to strike out "$484,050" and insert "$571,550," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Office of Markets and Rural Organization, $571,550.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 4, after the word "work," to strike out "$19,702,712" and insert "$20,143,617," so as to make the clause read:

Total, Department of Agriculture, for routine and ordinary work, $20,143,617.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge as to this item. It states that it is the total expenditure for the Department of Agriculture. It does not state that in words, but it is a total for the Department of Agriculture, "for routine and ordinary work, $20,143,617." Then, over here there is an item for general expenses, $440,000, in addition to this $20,143,000. So there are more items of the kind scattered along in that way.

Mr. GORE. If I understood the Senator's question, I will say there is an item of that character under each bureau and division. The general expenses of each division are provided for in the appropriation relating to that division.

Mr. LANE. But there are "general expenses, $440,150."

Mr. GORE. The total on page 73 is for the "Office of Markets and Rural Organization."

Mr. LANE. The item before that was "For general administrative expenses in connection with the lines of investigation, experiments, and demonstration conducted in the Office of Markets and Rural Organization, $23,250." Then this other item is "For general expenses, $440,150"; and then there is another item on the same page, "Total for Office of Markets and Rural Organization, $571,550"; then over here is this item, "For routine and ordinary work, $20,000,000." It is rather confusing, I submit.

Mr. GORE. Perhaps it could be arranged differently and with more wisdom; but the item to which the Senator has referred is for general expenses, another is for incidental expenses, and $20,000,000 is the aggregate for all the bureaus.

Mr. LANE. What are general expenses considered to be? What is the nature of those expenses?

Mr. GORE. The bill contains an enumeration of them.

Mr. LANE. You have an estimate for them?

Mr. GORE. They are estimated for.

Mr. LANE. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Miscellaneous," on page 75, after line 10, to insert:

That hereafter when any State shall provide for terminal inspection of plants and plant products, and shall establish and maintain, at the sole expense of the State, such inspection at one or more places therein, the proper officials of said State may submit to the Secretary of Agriculture a list of plants and plant products and the plant pests transmitted thereby, that in the opinion of said officials should be subject to terminal inspection in order to prevent the introduction or dissemination in said State of pests injurious to agriculture. Upon his approval of said list, in whole or in part, the Secretary of Agriculture shall transmit the same to the Postmaster General, and thereafter all packages containing any plants or plant products named in said approved lists shall, upon payment of postage therefor, be forwarded by the postmaster at the destination of said package to the proper State official at the nearest place where inspection is maintained. If the plant or plant products are found upon inspection to be free from injurious pests, or if infected shall be disinfected by said official, they shall upon payment of postage therefor be returned to the postmaster at the place of inspection to be forwarded to the person to whom they are addressed; but if found to be infected with injurious pests and incapable of satisfactory disinfection the State inspector shall so notify the postmaster at the place of inspection, who shall promptly notify the sender of said plants or plant products that they will be returned to him upon his request and at his expense, or in default of such request that they will be turned over to the State authorities for destruction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 76, after line 13, to insert:

On and after the passage and approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to deposit in the United States mails any package containing any plant or plant product addressed to any place within a State maintaining inspection thereof, as herein defined, without plainly marking the package so that its contents may be readily ascertained by an inspection of the outside thereof. Whoever shall fail to so mark said packages shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100.

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying out the purposes hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 77, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out an agreement heretofore made by and between him and the State of Washington, through its proper officers, looking to the exchange of lands and indemnity rights with said State, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available until expended when the said State shall have made available a like amount to be used for carrying out the aforesaid agreement: Provided, That such exchanges shall be made on the basis of approximately equal area and value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for a domestic potato quarantine, on page 77, line 20, after the word "Columbia," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$125,000, $25,000 of said sum to be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

Domestic potato quarantine: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with those States in the inspection of Irish potatoes where a quarantine has been or hereafter shall be established by the Secretary of Agriculture, prohibiting the movement of such potatoes from any State into any other State, District, or Territory of the United States except under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and for the enforcement of such rules and regulations, and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, $125,000, $25,000 of said sum to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 3, on page 78.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we have already passed it, but it seems to me that it ought not to be passed unnoticed. There is an item upon page 77 of $125,000 for New England.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they must raise potatoes in other sections of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but they raise potatoes that do not have to be quarantined like in New England.

Mr. GALLINGER. They may have to be quarantined next year perhaps.

Mr. NORRIS. This is for New England. I hope the Senator will not move to strike it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. I am going to move to add another amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 78, after line 3, to insert:

International Dry Farming Congress, Denver, Colo.: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with and make an exhibit at the next annual meeting of the International Dry Farming Congress, to be held at Denver, Colo., during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, illustrative of the investigations, products, and processes relating to farming in the subhumid, arid, and semiarid regions of the United States, including labor and all expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $20,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The item on page 78, "International Dry Farming Congress, Denver, Colo.," provides $20,000 "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with and make an exhibit at the next annual meeting of the International Dry Farming Congress to be held at Denver, Colo."

Mr. President, three years ago, I believe, was the first time an appropriation was made for assisting in the holding a congress at any place in the United States. That was the irrigation congress, which was held at Salt Lake City, being 25 years after the first irrigation congress was ever held in the United States. At that time there was appropriated $10,000. I think since that there was appropriated $20,000 for the dry farming congress held at some place in Oklahoma. Last year, as I remember, $25,000 was appropriated to hold it at some place in Kansas.

But it seems to me, Mr. President, that $10,000 is ample if we are going to make the appropriations for holding these congresses. I ask the Senator from Colorado if the people of Denver are not willing to assist the same as the people of Salt Lake City assisted in entertaining the delegates to the congress held there, and allow this appropriation to be cut to $10,000, the same amount which was provided for the great irrigation congress which was held at Salt Lake City?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the first appropriation that was made for a matter of this kind was to a contribution toward the exhibit which was made in Alberta, Canada, and that was $10,000. But there has been no appropriation for less than $20,000 for any place where this congress has been held in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, the Dry Farming Congress?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I mean the Dry Farming Congress. The congress to which the Senator refers is the Irrigation Congress, and that congress has gone out of existence by reason of its being consolidated with the Trans-Mississippi Congress. I want to state in relation to this Dry Farming Congress that it is of great importance. We held one once at Colorado Springs, Colo., and we did not ask for any contribution whatever from the National Government. So, if you take the two together, the average has been only $10,000, the same amount that Salt Lake City got for her Irrigation Congress.

But, Mr. President, this is one of the most instructive things to people who are endeavoring to reclaim the portion of the country known as the great semiarid region that can be devised. You may talk about instruction and reading, but the exhibits that were presented in my State when it was held at Colorado Springs consisted of enormous exhibits brought from all over the United States to show just what could be done on the arid lands and what character of plants could be raised there. It was a matter for which people would go and stay there. There were instructors at each of the departments, and the knowledge which was distributed at that time was of great value to the people. I was at the time governor of Colorado, and I spent a whole day at the exhibits, and I must say that it was a great advantage to me, and, I have no doubt, of great advantage to farmers.

This is not a congress of one day. It continues about two weeks, and persons can go there and can get more knowledge in one or two weeks than they can get from the Agriculture Department or from anything that is promulgated by simple literature. It is pretty nearly a school of instructions, and when we get those arid lands raising crops of some kind you will find that they will add great wealth and great population to the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree, Mr. President, with what the Senator said as to the beneficial results from holding this congress; but when I contemplate the fact that we have in the United States dozens of so-called international congresses—the Irrigation Congress, the Trans-Mississippi Congress, the Dry-Farming Congress, and I could enumerate others—I can not differentiate this from any of the great congresses that are held annually in this country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Colorado agree to pass over this amendment for the present?

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing——

Mr. STONE. Before it is passed over I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Utah. This is an international congress?

Mr. SMOOT. It becomes an international congress in this way, that the invitation is extended to some representatives of foreign countries to attend.

Mr. STONE. Who extends the invitation?

Mr. SMOOT. The name of the congress itself is the International Dry-Farming Congress. Congress does not do it, the President of the United States does not do it, but I think the congress itself does it.

Mr. STONE. I want to say——

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will allow me, every one of the bills, I understand, that have been passed authorized the President of the United States to invite the nations to send delegates with the express statement, though, that no part of the appropriation shall be used for the payment of the expenses of delegates.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is wrong in that statement. As I remember it: First, the Irrigation Congress was simply designated an irrigation congress. Then when the question came up of an appropriation after it had been in existence 25 years and it was to be held at Salt Lake City, where the first one was held, the members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House said that the appropriation should not be made for a congress, because of the fact that there were so many of them in the United States, and one would have as much claim on the Government as another. Then it was decided at that time to make it an International Irrigation Congress. The name was changed and the congress itself invited the representatives of foreign countries, and we had representatives from foreign countries to attend that congress. Since then the Dry Farming Congress has been established, and I understand that congress took the name of the International Dry Farming Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that in the congresses I have attended there have always been representatives of foreign Governments. I remember one from Australia was there, a man who made a speech in relation to the dry sections of Australia, and also from Alberta a large delegation came to that congress. I think over 100 came there.

Mr. WARREN. There was a representative from Brazil also.

Mr. SMOOT. But the President of the United States did not invite them.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I beg to say that I did not mean by my inquiry to provoke this sort of a discussion. I simply wanted to ask a question and get a direct answer, which would have taken but a moment. I have no wish to interfere, even if I could, with this bill or with this item. I wanted to say that a great many joint resolutions are introduced in one House or the other for so-called international congresses for almost every imaginable object. Large numbers of them have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations during the last several years; and I suppose most of them go to that committee because of the international character of the enterprises.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has adopted a rule which they adhere to with very rare exceptions, and the exceptions must have some special merit behind them. The rule is to turn down these joint resolutions for inviting foreigners in the name of the Government of the United States. We did for a while pass them, inserting, however, a proviso that the Government of the United States should never at any time in anywise be held responsible for the expenses of such congresses; but more recently it has been thought by the committee that it was hardly a dignified thing to do, to issue an invitation by the President of the United States, and at the same time say, "We do not intend to pay your expenses." I am thoroughly convinced, in my own mind, as are all the other members of the committee to which I refer, that the expenses of these congresses, so called, multiplying, as they are, ought not to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I say. I will say to the Senator, then, that if he is willing to allow this to go over to-night, I am perfectly willing to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this item going over? The Chair hears none, and the item goes over.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, we have now been in continuous session for more than 12 hours. I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee how much longer he desires to continue the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GORE. I will state to the Senator from North Dakota, and I intended to state to the Senate, that it is my purpose to ask the Senate to remain only a few moments longer. I therefore suggest that we consider only unobjected amendments.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. GORE. Any amendment to which there is objection we may pass over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, at the top of page 79, to insert:

Experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States, including the erection of barns and other necessary buildings, and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $60,000; and of the funds heretofore appropriated for the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States during the fiscal year 1915, not to exceed $7,500 is hereby made available for the erection of barns and other necessary buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I send to the desk an amendment to be read. I can not well offer it now, as committee amendments are first being considered. I ask, however, that the amendment be read and lie on the table, giving notice that I shall offer it at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

Experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the New England States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the New England States, including the erection of barns and other necessary buildings, and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $60,000; and of the funds hereby appropriated for the development of live-stock production in the New England States, not to exceed $7,500 is hereby made available for the erection of barns and other necessary buildings.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. This appropriation, I think, of $60,000 was in last year's appropriation bill, was it not?

Mr. RANSDELL. It was.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am asking the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. GORE. It was in last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask, now, whether or not it is intended to be a continuing appropriation, year after year, of $60,000 for this purpose?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will state that my fear is that it will be; but the department suggests that the amount already expended would in large measure be wasted unless there was another appropriation with which to continue the work. I will also state that the State of Louisiana is cooperating and is furnishing something more than 500 acres of land to assist the Government in the conduct of the experiment. I ask that the amendment be passed over for the present.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say just one word on the amendment before it is passed over. I want the Senator having the bill in charge to pause a moment while I read the first two lines of it:

Experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States, * * * $60,000.

I have been engaged more or less in live-stock production, and I never thought there was a different method of producing live stock in the cotton-growing States from that employed upon the prairies. I have thought the same method whereby we produce a steer or a mule in North Dakota would be the method adopted for the production of a like kind of animal in Louisiana.

I can understand, Mr. President, why, after you have so legislated that you have destroyed the sugar-cane industry in Louisiana, you might well expend a little money in making an investigation there to ascertain what can be raised on the land in place of that product. The individual farmer perhaps will not be able to go into the business himself and make experiments to see what he can do; he can not afford it; he has not the money, any more than upon the western plains we can experiment to ascertain what kind of trees or shrubs, and so forth, can best be grown. Most farmers would be bankrupt before they could ascertain that, but the Government can do it, and the Government ought to do something for those people there, from whom they have taken away the means of livelihood; but, Mr. President, upon the face of it, it does seem to me that it is merely spilling $60,000 down there, because we all know that there is no difference in the method of producing live stock in one section of the country from that of producing it in another.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from North Dakota think that Congress ought to discriminate in favor of the cane-sugar growers as against the beet-sugar growers in this matter?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no. I think, however, they have taken care of the beet-sugar growers, not in teaching them how to raise live stock, but at least in experimenting to see what else they can raise. I have no objection to the expenditure of money in investigating what the soil will produce; but for many millions of years, so long as there have been human beings upon the face of the earth, they have had a pretty fair idea of how live stock is produced, and we do not need any new lessons as to how to take care of sheep or of lambs, or how to take care of horses, cattle, mules, and so forth. It does seem to me, however, that if there is any good honest reason for the expenditure of $60,000 we ought to state the particular thing for which we want to expend it.

Mr. PENROSE. That amendment had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there may be several reasons actuating this appropriation; possibly the Senator from North Dakota, with his penetrating mind, has divined one or two of them; but I might say, in order to be perfectly ingenuous with the Senator, that the real motive actuating the department and the committee in proposing this appropriation was the hope that the precedent would justify and lead to a similar appropriation for New England.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma ask that the amendment go over?

Mr. GORE. I am not making the request, but some other Senators desire that it shall go over.

Mr. PENROSE. Let that paragraph go over until to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we ought to have a quorum to listen to this debate.

Mr. RANSDELL. What is the request?

Mr. PENROSE. I think this paragraph had better go over. It opens a wide vista, and we can meet the question with fresh minds in the morning.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. GORE. Let it go over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 79, after line 23, to insert:

Hereafter the President of the United States is authorized to designate such areas on any lands purchased by the United States under the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. L., p. 961), entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States or with the United States for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable streams," and acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof as should, in his opinion, be set aside for the protection of game animals, birds, or fish; and thereafter whoever shall hunt, catch, trap, willfully disturb, or kill any kind of game animal, game or nongame bird, or fish, or take the eggs of any such bird on any lands so set aside, or in or on the waters thereof, except under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time prescribe, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both: Provided, That this provision shall be effective only in those States the legislatures of which have consented or which hereafter shall consent to the making by the Congress of the United States or under its authority of such rules and regulations as, in the opinion of the Federal Government, may be needful in respect to said animals, birds, and fish on said lands and in or on the waters thereof.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to save the time of the Senate, I want to ask the Senator to allow that amendment to go over, because I think a point of order ought to be made against it; but I do not want to make it until I look further into the provisions of the amendment. I will assure the Senator that I will not discuss it at all to-morrow; but, if I conclude to do so, will simply make the point of order.

Mr. GORE. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator for information what the Agricultural Department has to do with naval stores?

Mr. NORRIS. To spend money in connection with them.

Mr. LANE. The provision at the top of page 81 reads:

For investigating the grading, weighing, and handling of naval stores, and preparation of definite type samples thereof, including the employment of necessary persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $5,000.

Is that an item to provide salaries?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the naval stores industry is a very important one in the States of Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, and the provision was inserted in the bill a year ago, I think, on the motion of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. LANE. What are naval stores?

Mr. FLETCHER. They are yellow-pine products, spirits of turpentine, and rosin, and they exist wherever yellow pine grows in this country.

Mr. LANE. What are naval stores used for?

Mr. FLETCHER. Spirits of turpentine are use for medicinal purposes, they are used in pharmacy, in paints, and in similar articles. Naval stores are forest products.

Mr. LANE. In former times naval stores used to be tar and pitch.

Mr. FLETCHER. Naval stores now mean turpentine and rosin.

Mr. LANE. They are not used in the Army or the Navy as they formerly were?

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I remember when this item was put in the appropriation bill. The purpose, as stated then, was to provide for the preparation of definite type samples of naval stores.

Mr. GORE. For their standardization.

Mr. SMOOT. For their standardization. I thought that was perfectly proper and right, and I thought we ought to provide for that in the bill of last year.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. My point of order is that the item we are discussing is not a committee amendment, and that discussion is not in order at the present time.

Mr. GORE. If discussion is to ensue, I will ask that the item go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we can return to it, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Oklahoma how long it is expected we are to continue to-night? I think it is about time we finished the day's work and took a recess, or we will be faced with a proposition to adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. This matter ought not to be under discussion at all; it is not an amendment reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. NORRIS. It is under discussion, however, and time is being taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The item will be passed over.

Mr. GORE. I think we will conclude in a few moments, I will say to the Senator.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 81, line 6, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$55,000" and insert "$40,000"; in line 7, after the word "appropriations," to strike out "now available or"; in line 11, before the word "work," to insert "field"; in the same line, after the word "Agriculture," to insert "outside the District of Columbia"; and in line 15, after the word "service," to insert "outside the District of Columbia," so as to make the clause read:

That not to exceed $40,000 of the lump-sum appropriation herein made for the Department of Agriculture shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles and motor boats necessary in the conduct of the field work of the Department of Agriculture outside the District of Columbia: Provided, That not to exceed $5,000 of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of such vehicles and boats, and that such vehicles and boats shall be used only for official service outside the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall on the first day of each regular session of Congress make a report to Congress showing the amount expended under the provisions of this paragraph during the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of why the words "outside the District of Columbia" are used in lines 15 and 16. The proviso reads:

Provided, That not to exceed $5,000 of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of such vehicles and boats, and that such vehicles and boats shall be used only for official service outside the District of Columbia.

Does that mean that in the District of Columbia pleasure yachts and joy rides are to be permitted?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; it leave officers within the District of Columbia subject to the provisions contained in the legislative appropriation bill of last year. A year ago we inserted the words "field service," so as not to interfere with the necessary service in the field, on the theory that officers within the District of Columbia would fall under the provisions of the legislative bill. In the hearings before the House committee the chief of one bureau stated that they had interpreted "field service" to include the District of Columbia. It was the purpose of the committee and the purpose of the Senate a year ago to limit the use of such vehicles to field service, so that machines could not be operated in the District of Columbia; but in view of that interpretation of the act of a year ago, these words were inserted so as to make it specific beyond any and all reasonable doubt, or any other sort of doubt, that they could not use this money within the District of Columbia for the purchase and operation of machines.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, as I understand, the item of $5,000 does not apply to the District of Columbia?

Mr. GORE. No, sir.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, it does not seem to me that the paragraph is drawn with a very great amount of clearness; but, if that is the explanation, I will make no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, perhaps I can make it a little clearer. The large amount is for maintenance, and so forth, and the $5,000 is for the purchase of vehicles; but they are only for use outside of the District of Columbia. The language is a little awkward, I will admit.

Mr. PENROSE. It is certainly awkwardly expressed, and not calculated to convey any other than the impression that within the District of Columbia vehicles may be used for purposes other than for official business.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will suggest that if the Senator will consider this in connection with the provision in the legislative bill of last year, he will see clearly the point which the committee had in mind, which is also the point he seems to have in mind, judging from his suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not think that in a great supply bill like this the accounting officers of the Government and the legislators called upon to pass the bill ought to be referred to an appropriation bill of the preceding year to secure an explanation of a provision. However, in view of the explanation of the chairman of the committee and of the senior minority member of the committee, I shall not press the matter any further, except to state that, in my opinion, the paragraph is awkwardly and obscurely drawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 81, after line 20, to strike out:

In case of an emergency arising out of an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, which in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture threatens the live-stock industry of the country, he may expend during the fiscal year, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500,000, or so much thereof as he determines to be necessary, in the arrest and eradication of any such disease.

And insert:

In case of an emergency arising out of an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, which in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture threatens the live-stock industry of the country, he may expend in the city of Washington and elsewhere, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500,000, or so much thereof as he determines to be necessary, in the arrest and eradication of any such disease, including the purchase and destruction, in cooperation with the States, of animals affected by or exposed to, or of materials contaminated by or exposed to, any such disease, and said sum shall be immediately available for the purposes specified.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I thoroughly approve that appropriation, if it is an appropriation. I notice, however, that it is not in the usual form of an appropriation, but it is peculiarly worded. It says that the Secretary of Agriculture may expend two and a half million dollars or such portion of it as he determines to be necessary in the event of this outbreak, and "said sum shall be immediately available for the purposes specified." I simply want to inquire if that beyond any question makes an appropriation which the Secretary of Agriculture—I will wait until the chairman of the committee is at liberty.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is going to be any waiting, I ask the Senator to yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I notice the chairman of the committee, versatile as he is, can not attend to two Senators at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut requests the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The inquiry in brief is this——

Mr. GORE. I understood the inquiry, and I think probably there is some force in it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has great powers of perception. I had not concluded my inquiry.

Mr. GORE. I understood the Senator to inquire whether or not this provision contained appropriating language; that is, was not written in the ordinary language of appropriations, and he doubted whether or not——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he is sure that there has been provided here a method by which the Secretary of Agriculture can draw upon the Treasury and get this money in case he needs it?

Mr. GORE. I imagined that was what the Senator desired to know. I will suggest in answer, however, that the amendment was drawn by the department. That does not argue in favor of its infallibility, and I think possibly it ought to be changed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Presumptively it is right. All I desire to do is to call the Senator's attention to it, so that he can consider it in conference.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he noticed the language on lines 11 and 12, where it says "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated"?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Of course it is asking the department to do it, and it does not read in the usual way, but I think that covers it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My impression was that the suggestion I made is overtechnical. I agree to it; but it is a very important appropriation, and I know how technical the auditors for the Treasury Department are.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that I appreciate the suggestion, and I think it ought to be acted on, and I will keep it in mind in conference, if a change is not made before it gets to conference.

I desire to submit, in lieu of the committee amendment, an amendment suggested by the department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment it is proposed to insert the following:

In case of an emergency arising out of the existence of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, threatens the live-stock industry of the country, he may expend in the city of Washington and elsewhere, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500,000, or so much thereof as he determines to be necessary, in the arrest and eradication of any such disease, including the payment of claims growing out of past and future purchases and destruction, in cooperation with the States, of animals affected by or exposed to, or of materials contaminated by or exposed to, any such disease, and said sum shall be immediately available for the purposes specified.

Mr. GORE. I will suggest that the amendment which I have offered is intended to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make the payments for cattle heretofore slaughtered. The value of those which have been slaughtered exceeds the emergency appropriation made sometime ago, and there was some doubt as to whether or not such payments could be made under the language of the appropriation. This is intended to remove any uncertainty.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator state what percentage of loss is met by the National Government?

Mr. GORE. One-half.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it one-half?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the entire amendment go over until to-morrow. Possibly the chairman may frame such a provision as would be certain to carry an appropriation and incorporate the provision that he has just offered in it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask that it go over until I can offer an amendment tending to perfect it on behalf of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I shall be very glad to withhold the request until the Senator offers a committee amendment to perfect it.

Mr. WARREN. I offer two amendments to the same section, both of which have been submitted to the chairman of the committee and both of which have the approval of the department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 82, line 17, after the word "disease," it is proposed to insert:

Wherever found, and irrespective of ownership, under like or substantially similar circumstances.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest——

Mr. WARREN. There is also another amendment, which the Secretary has not yet read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the second amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 18, it is proposed to substitute a semicolon for the period and to add the following:

Provided, That no payment for any such diseased or exposed animal or contaminated or exposed materials shall be made if any of the quarantine regulations of the Department of Agriculture shall have been so violated at the yards or pen where such animal is seized or materials found as to cause the disease against which the quarantine is established.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington requests that this amendment be passed over and that it be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. And these suggested amendments.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that it be likewise printed as it has been proposed to be amended, so that we may see it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, these amendments will be printed. The Chair hears no objection to this amendment being passed over. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 82, after line 18, to insert:

The unexpended balance on June 30, 1914, remaining to the credit of the appropriation authorized in the Agricultural appropriation act approved March 4, 1913, for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report to Congress on European cooperative land-mortgage banks and rural-credit unions, is hereby appropriated and made available for the fiscal years 1915 and 1916, including expenses incurred since the end of the fiscal year 1914, for the purposes set forth in said act, to be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman of said commission; and such audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such commission under this appropriation and under the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1914.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask what the unexpended amount of this appropriation is?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the amount actually unexpended and on hand is about $1,500. It was appropriated originally to carry out that work, and it was supposed at the time that it would remain available during the life of the commission. Now a technical point has been raised that it expired with the fiscal year, and this is intended simply to continue the appropriation during the lifetime of the commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the language mean in line 2, page 83, "including expenses incurred since the end of the fiscal year"?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is intended to meet the situation in which the commission finds itself under a technical ruling of the comptroller that the appropriation covered only the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. It continues the appropriation during the life of the commission, as the original act, according to our construction, meant. The most of the fund was expended prior to that time. I will say to the Senator, because, you will remember, this commission went to Europe and spent three months there.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I mean to suggest is that I think the words "including expenses" are rather blind, because if the Senator will look at the way this language is framed he will see that it provides that the unexpended balance "is hereby appropriated and made available for the fiscal years 1915 and 1916, including expenses incurred since the end of the fiscal year 1914." What does that mean—that a balance is made available, including some expenses?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are no extra expenses. It is simply to include the items from 1914 on down to date and to the end of 1916; that is all. It is no additional appropriation, no additional item.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me to be blind, but I am satisfied with it if the Senator is.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is all right. It is all right, I think, according to the direction of the comptroller.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I think this matter ought to go over. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I hope——

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Washington withhold that motion?

Mr. JONES. No; I will not. It is now nearly 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor, and does not yield it.

Mr. JONES. The Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES. No; I did not ask the Senator to yield at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor. He had not surrendered the floor.

Mr. JONES. But the Presiding Officer recognized me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked the Senator from Florida if he would yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator insist that this matter shall not be acted on now?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Everybody else is willing to agree to it.

Mr. JONES. When the Senator gets through I will take my action.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the motion to take a recess is agreed to I simply wish to ask the consent of the Senate, or I will ask it to-morrow morning before this bill is taken up again, immediately on the assembling of the Senate, to have a short executive session.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Florida if he will not yield to me to offer some reports from the Finance Committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. JONES. That is all right.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of Borner Grange, No. 7, Patrons of Husbandry, of Lander, Wyo., praying for the adoption of a system of rural credits, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented petitions of sundry citizens of Delaware, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BRYAN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 21491) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 21328) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and I submit a report (No. 1028) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21201) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, to report it with amendments and submit a report (No. 1024) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 19061. An act for the relief of homestead entrymen under the reclamation projects of the United States (Rept. No. 1026); and

H. R. 19116. An act to grant certain lands to the city of Grand Junction, Colo., for the protection of its water supply (Rept. No. 1025).

R. 21218) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1030) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21089) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1029) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1062) granting a patent to Joseph Robicheau, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1031) thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 5909. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880 (Rept. No. 1033); deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 21546), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator that he make it 11 o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it was understood, or, at least, a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber understood, that the session to-night would last only until about 10 o'clock. We have been here an hour longer, and I appeal to the Senator to make it 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will change the motion to 11 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 10 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Wednesday, February 24, 1915) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 25, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m..

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1915.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, for the industry, patience, courage, integrity, and self-control which obtains in the Members of this great legislative body—for the courtesy displayed when feelings are tense on questions of moment before them. Let Thy blessing be upon them in the closing hours of this historic Congress, that they may finish their work and leave behind them a record worthy of emulation. And Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 20347. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill H. R. 19909, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Army appropriation bill, H. R. 20347, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. GARDNER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GARDNER. The Speaker asked if there was objection, and I rose to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. All right.

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he is in possession of a letter which was written by the Secretary of War or by Gen. Scriven pointing out the necessity of this increase in the aviation appropriation?

Mr. HAY. I am.

Mr. GARDNER. And is the chairman inclined to think that there is some merit in the letter?

Mr. HAY. For what purpose does the gentleman ask that question?

Mr. GARDNER. Because the gentleman, when this was put to a vote in the House, did not mention the existence of that letter—that he had it at the time.

Mr. HAY. I do not recall now whether I had it then or not. I do not know whether it was my business to mention it, even if I did have it.

Mr. GARDNER. When I raised the question as to the gentleman making a mistake in his $300,000 figures, I was supplied immediately afterward with a copy of this letter.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that what was asked for by the War Department was $400,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. And the Committee on Military Affairs cut it down to $300,000, and the Senate committee has raised it to $400,000.

Mr. GARDNER. I understand.

Mr. HAY. And when we get into conference we will do the best we can about it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement from the Forest Service regarding the proposed reduction in the size of the Olympic national monument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, if there are no appropriation bills demanding consideration, I ask that the Speaker lay before the House the bill (H. R. 17869) providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the southern district of the State of Georgia, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17869) providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the southern district of the State of Georgia.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. I rise for the purpose of moving a nonconcurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make a preferential motion. I desire to move to concur in all three Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] makes a preferential motion to concur in all three of the Senate amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of that motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman undoubtedly has the right to it.

Mr. WEBB. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, have I not?

The SPEAKER. Yes; but everybody has the right to inject that remark into the proceedings.

Mr. WEBB. Certainly. I wanted to see if we could have some agreement as to the time for the discussion of this motion, because I realize the importance of time at this juncture, and I am willing to do my part toward expediting the disposition of the public business. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman any time he desires, so far as my hour is concerned.

Mr. CRISP. I realize at this stage of the session that the House can not take much time on this bill, and I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. We have plenty of time this morning, for all that I can see.

The SPEAKER. What suggestion has anybody to make about this bill?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the motion to concur and nonconcur be limited to two hours, one half the time to be controlled by myself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman from Minnesota opposed to this bill?

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be allowed to control the time instead of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that the debate on the motion to concur in these amendments shall be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and the other by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Now, for what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. The purpose was to have a division of the time, to be controlled as it is already decided to be controlled, one-half by the friends of the amendment and one-half by those who are opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, when this bill passed the House it provided for an additional judge in the southern district of Georgia. The business of the courts there was falling behind. The late Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, had an agent of the Department of Justice investigate the status of the docket in the district, and he reported that he thought Judge Speer, the judge of that district, should have additional help, because only 62 per cent of the cases filed were being tried yearly, and the business of the court was gradually falling behind, and the Attorney General had Judge Grubbs, from Alabama, detailed to help catch up with the docket.

This bill was introduced in the House by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WEBB], and not by any of the Georgia Members. The Judiciary Committee reported it favorably, the report being a unanimous one. The House will recall that a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was sent to Georgia to investigate the conduct of the judge of the southern district, Judge Emory Speer. When the committee returned they were of the opinion that the district needed relief, and this bill was the outcome of their report, being introduced, as I said, not by a Georgia Member but by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. WEBB, who had just returned from an investigation of the conditions in the judicial district. If the Members of the House will notice the report, they will see that former Attorney General—now Justice—McReynolds on August 4, 1914, wrote the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WEBB] to this effect:

> Permit me to reply to your letter of this date, inclosing House bill 17869, providing for an additional judge for Georgia, etc.
> Under existing circumstances it seems to me essential that there should be another judge in the southern district of Georgia. The conditions there are lamentable, and I know of no other way in which they can be speedily remedied. I hope the bill will be promptly enacted into law.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman had reference to the House bill, had he not?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. What has the gentleman to say with reference to the amendment put on by the Senate to make two permanent judges there?

Mr. CRISP. I will come to that in a moment. I was trying to acquaint the House with the conditions that obtained which caused the House in its wisdom to pass the bill providing an extra judge in the district. This bill came up in the House, and the House in its wisdom saw fit to pass the bill as reported to the House, providing that the additional judge should be temporary—or, rather, that when Judge Speer either retired or passed away there should be no successor appointed to him and there should thereafter be only one permanent judge in the district.

Judge Speer is a very able man. In the vigor of his youth he was able to keep up with the work. He is well advanced in years and for a considerable time has suffered with hay fever, which necessitates his absence from the district a good many months in each year in a high altitude. Now, the House passed this bill, but adopted what is known as the Cullop amendment, which provides that the President shall make public the indorsements filed in support of the person appointed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia three minutes more.

Mr. CRISP. Personally I have no objection to the amendment, though I doubt whether it is constitutional. I realize that in saying that I may bring ridicule upon myself for mentioning the Constitution in this body. [Applause.] But, Mr. Speaker, at this late day in the session I fear that if the House insists upon that amendment it may jeopardize the bill. For that reason I have moved that the House concur in the Senate amendment to eliminate from the bill the Cullop amendment.

The southern district of Georgia covers the entire southern half of the State and has a population of 1,340,000 people. It has two large ports in it. Judge Speer lives in Macon, which is over 200 miles from either Savannah or Brunswick. Savannah is the largest port for the export of naval supplies in the world. It is the second largest port for the exportation of cotton in the world. Brunswick has a large commerce, and there is a considerable maritime practice in this district. There are 76 counties in the southern district of Georgia. In my opinion, the Senate believed that the best interests of the Government would be served by dividing this very large district into two districts. Therefore the Senate adopted an amendment providing that there should be two judges, or that the new judge should be permanent, which will mean, if the bill becomes a law, that later the southern district will be divided and there will be two districts. According to the RECORD, page 4215, of the proceedings of the present session of Congress, Senators BURTON and ROOT favored the passage of this bill with this amendment making this judge permanent, and it was stated on the floor of the Senate that it had the unanimous support of the Senate Judiciary Committee. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the best interests of the Government and the people of Georgia will be best subserved by this judge being made permanent, and therefore I have moved to concur in the amendment so providing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia two minutes more.

Mr. CRISP. I thank the gentleman, and I will stop at the end of that time.

The third amendment simply strikes out the provision allowing the senior circuit judge to designate which district judge shall hold the court. That amendment is unnecessary, because section 23 of the Judicial Code, passed March 3, 1911, regulates this matter. If this bill becomes a law, the general law will provide that until the district is divided the senior circuit judge shall designate the judge to hold the court, so that this provision of the bill as it passed the House is unnecessary. The Senate amendment is a wise one, and I hope it will be concurred in. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS]. If he does not desire to use the time, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to use five minutes of his time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair remind me when I have used 10 minutes? I do not think there is any need at all of this additional judge. When we passed the bill it was stated that the judge there, Judge Speer, was in ill health and was not attending to the business of the court so as to keep it up to date. The other day somebody down there sent me a clipping from the Savannah News, containing a statement made by Judge Speer in discharging the Federal grand jury recently. This clipping is dated February 17, 1915. In this statement to the grand jury Judge Speer, among other things, said:

> You will be very glad to learn that the business of the district is in a most satisfactory condition.

This follows a statement of the number of cases pending in the court, the number of new cases which had been brought, and the number of cases which had been disposed of, with an analysis of the cases which were pending. For instance, take the criminal cases, one important class of suits in that court. Of these there were 179 pending on the 28th of last December. Of that number 57 had been instituted during the months of November and December of last year. In 28 cases no arrests had been made. This left only 94 criminal cases in the entire district over two months old. Of the 176 civil cases pending, 13 were pending on reference before masters; 5 for settlement; in 1 the defendant was dead and no party made; 27 had been filed recently and were not ready for trial or final action; 4 were ancillary to proceedings pending in other districts; 2 awaited the decision of the circuit court of appeals; and 1 awaited the mandate. The judge goes through the different classes of cases pending in his court and shows that the business is up to date, probably better in that district than almost any other district in the United States. So you see there is no congestion of business there.

I also received a clipping from the Albany Herald of the date of February 5 last, which has this heading to it:

United States court had a busy session. Practically nothing remaining on the docket after adjournment on January 25.

It has this statement:

The United States court transacted a great deal of business at the recent January term in Albany, and a recapitulation of the docket is highly interesting. It shows that not a single case which could be disposed of was left unattended to, and the docket is in excellent shape.

Then follows a statement in detail of the several cases, bankruptcy cases, naturalization cases, criminal business, and so forth, and the article winds up with the statement, "No cases or matters were left undisposed of that could be tried."

These statements, which can not be successfully contradicted as to the details, show that there is no need of an additional judge in Georgia at this time. More business has been disposed of in that district during the last few months by far than in the average of districts in the United States, and fewer cases undisposed of are pending by far than in the average districts in the United States.

I appreciate the desire of gentlemen in the House to create additional judgships, to be filled by their friends or by a friend, but, after all, that is hardly a sufficient reason for providing an additional judge. If we are ever to exercise any economy, we ought to exercise it in regard to matters of this sort.

Doubtless many people would like to be appointed to a judgeship for life, and if this bill passes some one person will receive the appointment. But if the bill passes it will be for the benefit of that person and not for the benefit of the public business; the public business of the district does not require an additional judge.

It is true that that is not the question now pending in the House, but gentlemen on the other side who have spoken have urged that the House recede from its position in reference to the publicity, and so forth, because of the need of a judge. The judgeship can wait; the House has repeatedly declared its position on these questions, and the House is entitled to maintain its position, instead of yielding weakly to the Senate. When the bill was before the House it was urged that the bill ought to pass because it was such a trifling matter; it did not involve the appointment of a permanent judge. Now, gentlemen say that they want a permanent judge. If the proposition before the House when the bill passed had been the appointment of a permanent judge, I do not believe that the House would have passed the bill.

There are in the United States, as shown by the report of the Attorney General, at least 40 or 50 districts that need a judge much more than this district. The House, instead of constantly creating additional judgeships, ought, in my opinion, to restrict the jurisdiction of the Federal court, so that so many cases will not be taken from the State courts to the Federal courts. [Applause.] We will never accomplish that purpose if we constantly increase the number of the Federal judges. There is no reason why every corporation having a lawsuit involving over $5,000 should be permitted to take it to the Federal court. The people, the individuals and the corporations, on matters which do not involve great national or constitutional questions ought to be willing and ought to be compelled to submit their differences to the local State courts. [Applause.] I think the only way to accomplish that is to stand out against increasing the number of the Federal judges. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of saving time I wish to say that we will have but one more speech on this side, and if the gentleman from Illinois will use the remainder of his time it may be that we will cut the two hours short.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, since this bill was projected into the House this morning I have taken occasion to examine the reports of the Attorney General for the year 1913 and the last one available, that of 1914. These reports give a detailed account of the business pending in the northern district of Georgia as well as all other districts of the United States. I have compared the condition of business pending in the northern district of Georgia where it is proposed to have two permanent judges under the bill now presented for consideration with those existing in districts in Indiana, the eastern district of Washington, and the district I am most familiar with in my own State, the eastern district of Wisconsin.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. This bill provides for an additional judge in the southern district of Georgia and not the northern district.

Mr. STAFFORD. The tables that I examined were for the southern district of Georgia. It was a mere inadvertence in saying northern district.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman the total number of cases tried last year in Indiana and the total number in Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have. In the case of Indiana other than those suits to which the United States was a party, and that is the main factor in the consideration of the bill before us, there was commenced during the fiscal year 120 suits. There was terminated during the year 134, leaving as unfinished at the close of business June 14, 145. The district of Indiana is represented by only one district judge.

Let us compare the conditions of business in this southern district of Georgia, where they ask in the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia to constitute permanently two judges. I claim there is not much basis for an argument made in favor of the emergency judge coming to the relief of Judge Speer, according to the statement made by the Attorney General in his reports.

I have here the statistics for the southern district of Georgia. Number of cases commenced during the fiscal year, 79; number terminated, 68; pending at the close of business June 30, 130. More cases were pending for disposal in the district of Indiana than in the southern district of Georgia.

Mr. COX. How many in the whole State of Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. That, of course, takes in another district. I have the northern district here, and I will give the gentleman the figures; but that is beside the question before us, because we are only providing an additional judge in the southern district. In the northern district the number of cases commenced during the fiscal year was 94; number terminated, 81; number pending at the close of business June 30, 153. There is more warrant for an additional judge in the case of the northern district than there is in the southern district.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the comparison in new business between Georgia and Nebraska, which has two judges?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course Nebraska is a Western State. I have not examined that. I think that you will find in the case of Nebraska that they would not have near so much business, because it is an agricultural State.

Mr. MURDOCK. They have two judges there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; and one office was created, no doubt, in years gone by to give some place to a favorite of a Member of another body, just as the proposal is here to give some additional place to some favorite, so that he may hold a life job. I can give that in Nebraska, if the gentleman wishes, but I hardly think that is a parallel case, because Georgia may be likened more to Indiana, where there is not only agriculture but also manufactures, the same as in Wisconsin. I will take the case of Nebraska.

Mr. MURDOCK. Just the new cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is but one district in Nebraska, according to the report.

Mr. MURDOCK. There are two judges.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there are two judges, it is not disclosed by this report. Number of cases commenced during the fiscal year, 273; number terminated, a very good record, 326; number pending at the close of business, 317. I could go on and cite figures from the other districts which I have examined, but I think I have shown in the figures given of the condition of business in parallel district courts that there is no reason for a permanent additional judge in the southern district of Georgia, as this bill contemplates in the Senate amendment. As the bill passed the House it was provided that upon the death or resignation of the present incumbent of that court that position should not be filled. That practice has only been followed in a few cases where the conditions have been presented of an aged judge, one who had reached the age of retirement but who refused to retire because he wished to die in office, clogging of the business of the court. I remember in my service of 10 years three or four bills have been introduced to cover those emergencies. Many of us waived the question as to whether there was real need for an additional judge for temporary purposes because of the unpopularity of Judge Speer and voted in favor of it, so as to remove all doubt.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] makes a strong plea on the ground that Judge Speer is a hay-fever sufferer. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be one of those unfortunates myself, but during the past two summers I have remained at my work here in Washington. Two years ago I was a member of the lobby-investigating committee, and while at home was summoned here for that work. I remained here during all of that summer and suffered the torments of the damned. Nevertheless I worked, and again I remained here all of last summer during the hay-fever season, from the middle of August until the latter part of October. That is only a temporary condition which occurs when judges usually take their vacations. There is no good argument to be made for the passage of this as a temporary relief measure, because the condition of the calendar does not show that the business is being congested there and that justice is in any way being impaired by delay.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Have not the statutes of the United States been recently amended so as to authorize the transfer of a judge from another district anywhere in the United States for the purpose of relieving congestion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, some time ago we passed here a relief measure authorizing the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court to assign circuit judges for relief in New York only, but the civil code, as I recall, authorizes the Chief Justice to assign district judges to other districts, but the gentleman will realize that the district judges are not inclined to leave their own districts and take up additional work in other districts. They are willing to go to New York because of the experience gained by a brief service there of two or three months, but they do not care to be assigned to a little district in the South or in the West. They decline to serve, and it is necessary to have the full cooperation of the judge before he is assigned. That would not be a relief, if there was really any emergency presented here for consideration.

I say to the House on this presentation that I can see no reason for having an emergency judge to come to the relief of this district and the relief of Judge Speer, and certainly no good reason can be advanced in favor of having two judges for the southern district of Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 21546) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and for prior years, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (No. 1440), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen have just inquired respecting the appropriation bills, and I desire to say that this is the last of the general appropriation bills. [Applause.]

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to concur in the Senate amendments will be voted down. The first Senate amendment was to strike out an amendment adopted by the House by a very decisive vote of more than 100 majority. It was to make public by the President all indorsements of the applicants. The second amendment of the Senate is to abolish the temporary provision in reference to this judge and therefore to make it permanent. Now, surely it will not be contended here that this kind of practice in legislation ought to be indulged in even to give some of our friends an office——

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman support the bill if the judgeship is left temporary or as an emergency matter and the permanency of it stricken from the bill?

Mr. CULLOP. No; I will not support it then. I do not believe in a duplication of these judgeships. Even if the duplication were made to give my very best friend a job, I would not vote for it then. I do not believe in looting the Public Treasury in that way. I am opposed to that manner of dealing out the patronage. I believe in a higher standard in dispensing the patronage. There is a proper way to get at this. If the present incumbent is not satisfactory, prefer charges and have him removed. Dispose of him in the proper way and not by this proposed questionable method. Our platform indorsed the publicity of these matters, and we ought to carry out the pledges of our party, because the people indorsed that platform at the polls and expect us to obey their instructions. The Senate has refused to comply with it in respect to this particular proposition, and that responsibility is with it to satisfy the people for its breach of duty. Shall that be the policy of this House, especially when that policy is to repudiate a plank in our platform? I hope not. We should be true to the trust reposed and not falter in our duty. Now, from the showing of the gentleman from Illinois, there is no need for this judgeship. The business of that district is up as nearly as any of the courts of this country. In fact, it is in a much better condition than many of the districts in different parts of the country. It is in a better condition than nearly every other district in the United States, and it therefore clearly appears litigants are not suffering from this cause.

Now, because a judge is disagreeable to some litigant or to some of the people in that district, or because he does not retire and give some other man a good job, I do not think that is any excuse for us here in this instance to trample upon what is right and just. There are not as many cases in that district as there are in the district of Indiana. There is not as large a population in the State of Georgia, with its two districts, as there is in the State of Indiana, comprising one district. With more than 3,000,000 of population, with many large business interests of various kinds important in character, one judge in Indiana does the business, and is not occupied nearly all the time each year. In the State of Nebraska, with one judge, that judge is doing as much business, according to the report of the Attorney General, as is done in both districts in Georgia.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the gentleman will find there are two judges in Nebraska.

Mr. CULLOP. I am taking the Attorney General's report as read here a moment ago, which says there is only one. There are two judges—a circuit and a district judge—but the circuit judge no longer holds court as a trial judge in the hearing of cases.

Mr. KINKAID. I desire to say to the gentleman there are two district judges in Nebraska.

Mr. CULLOP. Two district judges, with a population that is nearly as large as the State of Georgia, and with more cases in the court than there are in both districts in Georgia, as the report shows, and those two judges are keeping up the business in the State of Nebraska, but one judge in Indiana is doing the business of that State and keeping up with the docket, and frequently holds court in other States. Now, what is the situation here? It is the policy in litigation that all litigation possible should be tried in the State courts and not in the Federal court; but if we are to duplicate the judgeships to reward political friends or to escape the wrath of a tyrannical judge to appease some one who imagines he has a grievance, then we will reverse the settled policy so long in existence and establish a new one which will be subject to great abuse and reflect on the judiciary of the entire country and one that will provoke intense criticism throughout the country. If we establish this policy, we will regret it, and the country will suffer because of it. I dare say one could not go in a district but what he would find somebody who has a grievance against the presiding judge, whether it is real or imaginary is immaterial. That is another consideration. But there will be found no judge who sits on the bench and administers the laws but what he will trample upon the toes and offend some one in the administration of the same. Appoint these duplicate judges, establish this policy, and we will break down that better policy in litigation; that is, to discourage litigation in the Federal courts and let the State courts settle the litigation.

This proposed policy, this breaking down of a well-settled tradition, will encourage it, because there will be an attempt to make more business in the Federal court and try cases there that ought to be tried in the State courts, bring litigants from long distances, and impose hardships both as to the consumption of time and as to the cost of litigation. The adoption of the policy here proposed will menace the administration of justice and have a bad effect on the public. Now, I am going, when the time comes, to ask for a separate vote on these amendments. The first amendment proposes that the President of the United States, before he makes the appointment of these judges, shall make public the names of the indorsements of the applicant. [Applause.] This is the reason that this fight is on. The Senate is hostile to this amendment. I do not know whether the applicants are or not, but I should think that any man who would apply for the high office of a judgeship would not be afraid or ashamed to have his indorsers made public before the appointment. If he is, he is unworthy to hold that important office and should not be considered in making the appointment. I am sure no President of this country would refuse to comply with such a law. This is the question involved in this bill. I stood for this amendment under a Republican Executive; I stand just as strongly for it under a Democratic Executive. [Applause.] I see no reason why I should be for it when a Republican was President and against it when a Democrat is President. If it is good in one case, it is good in the other. I take it that the constitutionality of this amendment will not longer be controverted. It has been assailed on this ground, but in vain. That question has been determined here in this House on more occasions than one, and on each occasion that assault has been refuted from every standpoint. The principles of the Constitution apply. The principles embodied in that great document may be old, but they easily apply to new doctrines as the occasions arise and sustain them, and it does in this instance, to the delight of its friends and to the chagrin of its enemies. Things now are conceded constitutional which five years ago were denounced as unconstitutional; but they now accept the application of old principles to new doctrines, and this amendment means another step in advance in this respect, one for the public good and the advancement of essential protection to the courts of the country and the welfare of the people. It will prevent vicious and unfounded attacks on the judiciary of the country and uphold the dignity of the courts.

It means this, that if we stand by this amendment we will soon get another amendment to the Constitution that will be hailed with delight in this country. That amendment will be that judges shall be elected for specified terms by a vote of the people in the districts over which they are to preside. Can any man give a reason why the people are competent to select a President, to select State judges, and other public officers, but when you come to the selection of a Federal judge they are not competent to make a selection for that office? The sooner we get this amendment, gentlemen, anybody in this House can see the sooner we will be relieved from such vicious legislation as is proposed here now, and the sooner we will secure the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution requiring that all Federal judges be elected for specified terms, and then the people can select their judges and Congress will not be troubled with such embarrassing legislation as is now proposed. The adoption of the amendment which I have proposed will hasten the authority to elect judges and other Federal officers, which will produce a better era in this Republic and elevate its standards among the people. I hope the day will soon come when the people will elect their officials, and the life tenure will be abolished. A better condition will then prevail, and better administration of public affairs result.

I can not imagine a more vicious thing than to legislate a man out of office by indirection, as they are proposing to do in this bill. It is not to relieve a congested docket; that is not its real purpose, but the real object of this measure means to legislate a Federal judge out of office and put somebody else in his place. Behind this is concealed the real object and another purpose is made to appear, but it will not deceive us. The proposition is vicious within itself. It is revolutionary. If the judge is guilty of such misconduct that he is unfitted to hold his court, charges ought to be preferred against him, and have them investigated, and if sustained remove him as the law prescribes. But it is revolutionary procedure when Congress proposes to establish a new office, a duplicate office, and put the present judge out of office by indirection. We should hesitate before we adopt such a method and consider the consequences of such a course. That is just what this kind of legislation means. It is not only revolutionary legislation, but it is indefensible from any standpoint. Unmasked, it is an attempt to appropriate spoils before the time has come. It is a new way of reaching the pie counter. Now, for one I do not justify the plan, and I do not believe anybody else would openly defend it. It will not be commended by many, I am sure. It is not the way to obtain a judgeship in this country.

If such measures of legislation are resorted to for the purpose of removing the judiciary in this country it will lower the dignity of every Federal court in the United States and menace the judges in the discharge of their duties. Men who hold the judgeships will stand trembling with fear as to the next step Congress will take to legislate them out of office and deprive them of their positions. The spoilsman will camp on their trails all the time. As I have said, the whole plan is revolutionary in its purpose; it is hostile to the spirit of our institutions and the good administration of justice. It is lowering the dignity of every Federal court in this country, and we ought to vote the measure down. We ought to stop such proceedings and put a veto now on this plan of removing Federal judges. For that is what it means, and it means nothing else. Such legislation ought to be voted down, because it is casting a gloom over the pure administration of justice in this country. If Judge Speer is abusing the functions of his high office, complain to the right tribunal, make the charges, have him investigated and removed, but do not adopt this revolutionary plan to put him or any other judge out of office. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this measure should become a law, and if the President will consider the purpose which animates its enactment, the real object behind it—spoils, purely spoils—the effect it probably will have on the judiciary of the country, watch the scramble for the appointment under it, in my judgment he will hesitate in giving it his approval; and if he refuses to approve it he will do a great work for the upholding of the dignity of the courts of this country and reprove this method of appropriating spoils, which can not, in my judgment, be from any standpoint justified.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, on December 9 when this bill was before the House I gave expression to my views, and tried to put before the House the reasons why we need this judge. My remarks can be found on page 66 of the RECORD of December 9, 1914. To the mind of any man who has investigated this matter, there can be no doubt but that we need this relief and need it very badly.

I was somewhat amused when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] read from the Savannah Press a statement made by Judge Speer. I am not at all surprised, because it shows the extent to which this judge will go to grip every inch of power that he can. He gave out a statement which he knows is absolutely against this bill, and, in my opinion, it was so aimed, and there can be little doubt about it. To show the need for another judge, I want to read from the report—pages 2 and 3—of the committee:

The subcommittee examined witnesses whose evidence tended to support the charges made against Judge Speer, as follows:

1. That he had violated section 67 of the Judicial Code in allowing his son-in-law, Mr. A. H. Hayward, to be appointed and employed in offices and duties in his court;

2. That he had violated the bankruptcy act in allowing compensation in excess of the provisions of that act to a trustee who was his personal friend;

3. That he had violated the laws as to drawing jurors;

4. That he had violated the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States;

5. That he had been guilty of the oppressive and corrupt use of his official position in deciding cases unjustly in favor of his son-in-law;

6. That he was guilty of unlawful and corrupt conduct in proceedings in cases wherein his son-in-law had a contingent fee;

7. That he was guilty of corrupt and unwarranted abuse of his official authority in using court officers who were paid by the Government as private servants without rendering any service to the Government.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Not just now, if my colleague will pardon me. The report further says:

8. That he was guilty of oppressive and corrupt conduct in allowing the dissipation of assets of bankruptcy estates in the employment of unnecessary officials and the payment of excessive fees;

9. That he was guilty of oppressive and corrupt abuse in granting orders appointing receivers for property without notice to the owners and without cause, resulting in great costs to the parties;

10. That he was guilty of oppressive and corrupt abuse of authority in refusing to allow the dismissal of litigation for the purpose of permitting relatives and favorites to profit by the receipts of large fees;

11. That he was guilty of improper, if not a corrupt, abuse of authority in taking, or causing to be taken, money from the court funds for his private use;

12. That he was guilty of oppressive conduct in entertaining matters beyond his jurisdiction, fixing fines, and the like;

13. That he was guilty of unlawful and oppressive conduct in denying the mandate of the Circuit Court of Appeals;

14. That he was guilty of oppressive conduct in allowing money to remain on deposit without interest in banks in which relatives or friends were interested;

15. That he was guilty of allowing excessive fees to receivers for improper purposes and also corrupt conduct in raising the amount of fees allowed to others in order that his son-in-law might profit thereby;

16. That he was guilty of attempted bribery of officials appointed to act as custodians;

17. That he was guilty of oppressive conduct in unlawfully seizing and selling property;

18. That he was guilty of the excessive use of drugs; and

19. That he was guilty of general unlawful and oppressive conduct for his own private ends.

On page 165, the conclusion of that subcommittee is as follows:

The subcommittee regrets its inability to either recommend a complete acquittal of Judge Speer of all culpability so far as these charges are concerned, on the one hand, or an impeachment on the other. And yet it is persuaded that the competent legal evidence at hand is not sufficient to procure a conviction at the hands of the Senate. But it does feel that the record presents a series of legal oppressions and shows an abuse of judicial discretion which, though falling short of impeachable offenses, demand condemnation and criticism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then I will yield to my colleague [Mr. TRIBBLE] for a question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Granting that all you have read there is true, this House passed a bill to create a temporary judge to be associated with Judge Speer. Now, how does your position prove that two permanent judges will be needed in the southern district of Georgia when Judge Speer is retired at 72 years of age, or goes off the bench?

Mr. EDWARDS. My answer to my colleague is this: Georgia, with a population of 2,609,000, has only two judges. Florida, with a population of 700,000, has two judges. Alabama, with a population of 450,000 less than Georgia, has two judges. In the southern district of Georgia there are 76 counties. There are five divisions. The courts are held at Albany, Augusta, Valdosta, Macon, and Savannah. The southern district of Georgia has a population of 1,354,000.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. EDWARDS. I have only two minutes, and I would like to offer further reasons in support of this bill. I yield to my friend.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does not the record show that the northern district of Georgia is seventh in volume of business in the United States, and does not the record show that Judge Newman is up with his business in that district? And does not the record show that there is only one-half of the business in the southern district that there is in the northern district?

Mr. EDWARDS. Judge Newman is an exceptionally good judge. I have looked into this matter, and I agree with the report of the committee that three permanent judges are necessary for Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to make a statement.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I find after conferring with the members of the Judiciary Committee that they feel they can not support the amendment providing that this judge shall be a permanent judge. And knowing that the district needs relief, and believing the surest way to get that relief is to defer to the views of the members of the Judiciary Committee, I give notice that I am going to change my motion by moving to concur in the first and third Senate amendments and ask the House to nonconcur in the amendment making the judge permanent. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the argument based upon the quotation from the articles of impeachment is wholly aside from the issue that is presented by these amendments. A bill was reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary recognizing, perhaps owing to the discontent and difficulty that pervaded that district and the dissatisfaction among members of the bar in some quarters, that the appointment of a judge temporarily would relieve the situation to a certain extent. The amendments that are returned from the Senate wholly destroy the original purpose of the bill, and for that reason I am opposed to the amendments.

As to the first one, I am in principle opposed to it. I would concur in striking that out of the bill, from my personal viewpoint, as being unnecessary and not a wise provision.

Now, with regard to the other two——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think we have the power to instruct the President as to what he should do in the matter of appointing judges under the Constitution?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not think we ought to ask for the production and printing of anything that is sent to the President to inform him in the exercise of his executive function.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman whether he did not think it would be an invasion of the power of the Executive for Congress to attempt to do that, and whether the President could not regard it as being absolutely an interference with his powers under the fundamental law to do a thing of that sort.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Well, I do not know as to that; it is a request that might be granted, and the President might furnish the information. Yet, I think it is an intrusion upon the Executive by the legislative branch; and inasmuch as I am opposed to the encroachment by the Executive upon the legislative branch of the Government, so I am opposed to the encroachment by the legislative branch upon the Executive.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has put it in the way in which I wanted to ask it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. We have to-day too much interference on the part of one branch of the Government with the functions of another, and I would like to have an opportunity at some time to voice a protest against it as a wrong that will produce evils the consequences of which it is impossible at this time to measure.

But, speaking of the bill, I do not object to the first amendment being concurred in. As to the second amendment, we ought not to concur in it, because it revolutionizes the legislation of the House completely and destroys the purpose of this bill. The statistics quoted here show clearly that there is no need of an additional permanent law judge in that district, and this temporary appointment, which would expire upon the death of the judge now holding the senior commission, was the only thing recommended by our committee.

As to third paragraph, which has been excluded by the Senate amendment, I have some doubt as to the wisdom of leaving that out of the bill. I think there ought to be a direction that the senior judge should arrange the order of business and the assignment of cases for trial in the district between the several district judges. There is no good reason for striking that paragraph from this bill, and I would like to have the gentleman who offered that motion to amend it so that it would apply only to the first Senate amendment and let the other two stand.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, there will be a separate vote taken on all of them, and the reason why I gave notice that I would make the motion to concur in the third amendment was that I thought the general Judiciary Code did regulate it exactly, and therefore the amendment was not needed. That is, the general law covers it, and it would not be necessary to incorporate it in this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is true, but, so far as this particular district is concerned, I felt that to have this formally expressed in this bill would be helpful, and not hurtful.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have tried in my association with my colleagues here to be frank about everything, and I want to be absolutely frank with the House in this instance. Although the appointment of this additional judge affects the State of Georgia, the people in the State of Georgia do not need an additional permanent judge. It is an absolutely useless charge on the Treasury of the United States. They ought not to have it. The judge of the northern district of Georgia, the Hon. William H. Newman, is now in his seventy-first year, and the volume of business in the northern district of Georgia as compared with the volume of business in the other districts of the United States ranks about fifth. The business in the northern district of Georgia is very satisfactory at this time as compared with the condition of the dockets in the southern district of Georgia.

Now, I have not one unkind word to say about Judge Speer; but I do say this: That the health of Judge Speer has been in such a condition for about four and one-half or five years that it is absolutely impossible for the judge to have kept up his docket in the southern district of Georgia. I understand that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has read a statement here from the judge as to the condition of the business. There is one condition that exists that I think I ought to mention. Judge Speer has been sick. He has been impatient, probably, and he has not run the court to the satisfaction of the bar, and I do not believe that he will be able to do it in the future. I believe he honestly thinks he will be able to do it, but I do not think he will.

Now, we need this temporary judge, and we need him badly, and we ought to have him. What I say about the temporary judgeship is predicated upon what the members of the bar in the southern district of Georgia tell me. Now, then, after Judge Speer's death we would have three judges in the State of Georgia. Two of them would be assigned to the southern district of Georgia; two of them would be assigned to the district in which we need help the least. Now, if we are to have an additional judge he ought to be in the northern district of Georgia, where the volume of business is done. But I hope the House will see fit to give this temporary judgeship to the people of the State of Georgia, because I believe they need it. I believe that Judge Speer, if it had not been for the fact that he has been under certain charges and is now anxious to exonerate himself, would admit that his physical condition is such that he can not competently attend to all the business of the southern district of Georgia.

Now, that is a frank statement about it. I do not care anything about the publicity of the indorsements of those folks. I know who the applicants are and who their indorsers are. Everybody in Georgia knows that. It is public. But if they want to put that in I do not care anything about it.

If they want to know who is indorsing these different candidates, I think they ought to know it. I know whom I indorsed. I did it openly. I went up to the White House at noonday and told the President who my candidate was, and I hope the President will appoint him in the event that we get this temporary judge. I have no doubt everybody in this House will be very glad indeed to see him appointed, because everybody in the House knows him. But to make this a permanent judgeship would be a waste of money, and it ought not to be done. I say with an equal amount of positiveness, on the other hand, that we ought to have this temporary relief, and I hope that gentlemen of the House will give it to us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I will consume five minutes. It may possibly be that the State of Georgia needs this temporary judge. I do not know anything about that; but I asked the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], while reading from the report of the Attorney General, to give some comparison between the volume of work done in the State of Georgia and the volume of work done in the State of Indiana. As I retain in my memory the figures that he gave of the total number of cases tried and disposed of in the entire State of Georgia last year and in the State of Indiana, I think the total number of cases tried and disposed of in Georgia was 30 or 40, or possibly 50, in excess of the number tried in the State of Indiana. Now, Indiana has only one district judge. While according to the figures the State of Georgia has probably a few more cases to try, surely when the magnitude of the business is taken into consideration the State of Georgia does not have much, if any, more litigation than the State of Indiana.

Judge Anderson, of my State, in the last two years has tried some of the most notable cases that have been tried in the United States. He has tried cases that took more than three months of hard work to dispose of. I refer to one, known throughout the United States as the dynamite case, which took upward of three months to dispose of. Yet not only has Judge Anderson kept his docket in the State of Indiana up to date, but he actually spends day after day in trying cases in the city of Chicago as a special judge. How does he do it? He does not begin his court at 1 o'clock in the day and adjourn at 4. Every morning when the clock ticks 9 o'clock, promptly the case is called, and, if necessary to expedite business, he requires the attorneys and parties litigant to remain there until 6 o'clock in the evening. Sometimes that is not altogether satisfactory to the attorneys or to the litigants, but Judge Anderson sees to it that the business never crowds his court, but on the other hand sees to it that his court crowds the business.

As I said a moment ago, it may possibly be that the State of Georgia deserves, for the time being, this temporary judge. I do not know about that. But as to its needing another United States district judge, basing my judgment upon the evidence presented here this morning and on the report of the committee, in my opinion there is no earthly use at all of another permanent judge.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the comparison made as to the volume of business tried in the State of Georgia during the last year is not, I think, exactly fair to the State, because Judge Speer tried absolutely no cases of any character during the year 1914, and the volume of business that has accrued in the southern district of Georgia, if it had been disposed of normally, would have increased the number of cases in the State very materially.

Mr. COX. That may be. The State of Indiana has a population of approximately 2,700,000. The State of Georgia has a population of about 2,600,000, and I repeat again that while, according to the report of the Attorney General, the total number of cases tried and disposed of in the State of Georgia was somewhat in excess of the number in Indiana, yet when you take into consideration the tremendous magnitude of the cases tried and the length of time it took to dispose of them, if the judge in the State of Georgia could conduct his court as Judge Anderson conducts his court, there would never be any demand from any source for an extra judge, not even for a temporary judge. If this proposition goes through, I agree heartily with my friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] that if the gentleman whom he has recommended, or whom I suppose he has recommended, is appointed to the bench there the business of the court will, I am sure, be transacted promptly and in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that he will withdraw his motion to concur in the second amendment and move to nonconcur, I shall have little to say.

When this bill passed the House originally I was very much impressed by the statement of the gentlemen from Georgia who favored the bill, as to the necessity of it to fill a temporary need. But when the gentlemen from Georgia, my good friend Judge CRISP and Mr. EDWARDS, this morning attempted to get the House to concur in the amendment of the Senate making this a permanent judgeship, and when they stated to the House that they believed that a permanent judge was necessary, and that they only withdrew that motion because they were satisfied it could not pass this House, highly as I respect those gentlemen, when they still think that a permanent judge is necessary, in view of the facts that they have presented, my confidence in their judgment as to the necessity of a temporary judge has been very greatly lessened. I am inclined to think that perhaps we could go on for a year or more with this one judge, and that the situation would take care of itself. But the motion is to be made to nonconcur, so I need not discuss this further.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield for a short interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. In my remarks on December 9 last, found on page 66 of the RECORD, I stated that I then thought we did need a permanent third judge. I have taken that position all along. I now think we ought to have three districts and three judges in Georgia. I took that position then.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman, I hold in my hand the bill as it was originally introduced in the House. Presumably the bill originally introduced was in accord with the wishes and judgment of the gentlemen from Georgia. That bill, as originally introduced and referred to the committee, made the judge a temporary judge only.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Speaking for myself, I never saw this bill, and I do not think any members of the Georgia delegation saw the bill until after it was introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WEBB, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LENROOT. I accept the statement of the gentleman from Georgia. I will say this, that if it had not been for the second section of the bill making the judge a temporary judge, this bill never would have reached the Senate.

I want to say a word with reference to what is known as the Cullop amendment. The gentleman from Georgia this morning stated that to speak of a constitutional question subjected a man to ridicule in this House, and that is true. Ever since our Democratic friends have been in control here it has been practically useless to discuss any constitutional question. Time and again you have passed bills through this House, and they have gone from this House to the Senate when every lawyer in the House knew that there were provisions in the bill in plain violation of the Constitution. So the gentleman from Georgia was correct in saying that it really subjected one to ridicule to discuss constitutional questions in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt the same statement can be made——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will not the gentleman make some exception to that statement?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I will. There are a few exceptions, like the gentleman from Georgia himself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin three minutes more.

Mr. LENROOT. We have come to a pass, Mr. Speaker, in this House where if a Member undertakes to quote from the Democratic platform of 1912 it subjects him to ridicule also, because there is scarcely a provision in that platform our Democratic friends have not violated. But upon the subject of the Cullop amendment, I will take the risk of subjecting myself to ridicule by undertaking to read from the Democratic platform of 1912 upon this identical proposition.

The print of this platform which I have here is so fine that I can not read it, but I will put the text in the RECORD. The substance of it is that we commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations made to the President in making appointments. That was your position then when there was a Republican President in the White House, and when you thought you would be making some political capital by taking such a position. Now that you have a Democratic President in the White House what has become of that platform declaration upon this proposition? Do you refuse to abide by it because you dare not take the position that you are willing to have your Democratic President make public the recommendations that have been made to him for the appointment? Were you playing politics four years ago? By your action now you admit that you were. Are you playing politics now by moving to concur in this amendment without attempting to secure a conference upon it to see if the Senate will yield? It is an admission upon your part that there was absolutely no good faith in this promise that you made to the people of America in your platform in 1912.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will read the provision in the Democratic platform which the gentleman from Wisconsin, owing to the fine print, did not read. This plank in the platform was adopted at the Baltimore convention just after the House had inserted in a bill creating an additional district judge a provision providing for publicity of indorsements. I hope the gentlemen on the other side of the House will feel that I am doing this in friendship, because it is pure friendship that causes me to occasionally remind the Democratic Members of that which they have tried to forget—the Democratic platform. [Laughter.]

I will commend a considerable portion of the Democratic side for voting in favor of this plank in the platform upon a number of occasions when it has been up before. The plank is this:

> We commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made.

What is the pending question before the House? The House inserted a provision in this bill that the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge. That followed the recommendation, or the commendation, of the Baltimore platform. That provision was inserted as an amendment to the bill on a roll call, and those gentlemen on the Democratic side who voted one way when the amendment was up and who vote another way to-day will have their names inserted as a special exhibit hereafter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and in Bryan's Commoner. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I can not yield. Gentlemen on that side of the House who voted for the proposition were held up by Mr. Bryan, now Secretary and then Secretary of State, as following the right course, and gentlemen who voted against it were pilloried by him. Those who change their votes will not only be pilloried by Mr. Bryan, but they will be pilloried by the Republicans every time we have a chance.

The proposition now is to strike this out of the bill, and we will have a roll call upon it. I hope this side of the House, under the circumstances, will vote against striking the provision out of the bill, and I hope the other side of the House, those who voted to put it in the bill, will have consistency enough to keep it in the bill. You have violated every other plank of your platform, you have gone back on the one-term provision, on the Panama Canal, on the deposit of public moneys in national banks, on almost every other plank in the platform, and I beseech you as your friend [laughter on the Republican side] to stick to one plank in the platform upon which you have already voted. You can not excuse yourselves for voting against this proposition now by saying that you voted for it once before and straddle both sides of the fence. [Laughter on the Republican side.] You have got to walk up to the rack and take your medicine. If you are in favor of any plank in your platform, you have got to vote against the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to strike this out of the bill. I hope you will be manly enough to be consistent for once. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Illinois used his entire time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has 1 minute left, and the gentleman from North Carolina has 32 minutes left.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, it can not be charged that I as an individual member of the Judiciary Committee have ever been in favor of creating useless judgeships. At numerous times during the last 12 years I have opposed the creation of district judgeships. In some instances I have favored them, notably in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and in Maryland. I opposed the creation of a new circuit judgeship in my own circuit. I have never yet advocated the creation of one to give somebody a job, and I never expect to.

When the resolution passed the House to investigate the conduct of Judge Speer a subcommittee composed of Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. FITZHENRY, and myself went to Georgia to investigate those charges, and we reported. Having been in the district two weeks we understood thoroughly the condition of affairs. We knew before we went that Mr. Wickersham, the Attorney General of the United States in 1912, had induced other judges to try to clear up the docket, which was then woefully congested. The docket has been congested for four years. After the resolution to investigate Judge Speer was adopted, of course, he tried no more cases. His health was bad, and we had certificates from doctors to the effect that he was almost in extremis, and we continued the hearing for three or four months on account of his condition. For 15 months, I believe it is, not a single case in the entire southern district of Georgia, composed of 76 counties, with more than 1,000,000 population, was tried by this judge. When we recommended that no further proceedings should be taken in the House in reference to his impeachment, the Committee on the Judiciary realized—and that is not the Democratic members alone, but Mr. VOLSTEAD, the ranking Republican member, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and all Republican and Democratic members—that there was a congestion of business in the southern district of Georgia that ought to be cleared up in the interest of the public and litigants and not in behalf of any particular individual. So deplorable had that condition become that three additional district judges had been sent into this district in an effort to clear it up, but it could not be done. Mr. McReynolds, the former Attorney General of the United States, just last fall wrote to this House a letter in which he declared that conditions in the southern district of Georgia were lamentable—about as strong a term as he could use. We know that there is a demand and an important demand for additional help for this now old and sickly judge in the southern district of Georgia. He can not do a mans' work as he once did. He has been a brilliant man in his day, but he is nearly 68 years of age and has been a sufferer from a chronic disease for many years.

The Committee on the Judiciary recommended this temporary judgeship unanimously. The House passed the bill, and that is as far as the Committee on the Judiciary ask you to go. We have never asked you to make a permanent judge there. I told the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that I, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, could not afford to ask that the House make the judgeship permanent, because we think, we hope at least, that with a strong judge put in to help clear up this docket, that when Judge Speer's time for retirement comes, one able-bodied judge can keep up the work, and that is all we ask you to do. Therefore we ask you to disagree to Senate amendment No. 2 and to agree to Senate amendment No. 3, which strikes out the provision with reference to the distribution of work. Section 23 of the Judicial Code provides for that in the same language, and it is immaterial whether this stays in the bill or goes out of it.

On amendment No. 1 I ask the House to concur. I think we have come to a time where we may just as well discuss this Cullop-Mann amendment frankly and freely as lawyers. I voted for the Cullop amendment before I had investigated the constitutional side of it, but I swore to support the Constitution of the United States, and every Member does the same thing when he is sworn in here. Mr. Speaker, this is not the Cullop amendment that is on this bill. This is the Mann amendment. Mr. CULLOP, of Indiana, originally offered this amendment, but when this bill was up for consideration last December I believe the gentleman from Illinois adopted it and offered it—offered it and then voted against it, a rather peculiar situation for a distinguished man to occupy, but he did it, and his avowed purpose is to put the Democrats "in a hole." I do not think we ought to legislate in that way. I think we ought to be frank among ourselves, and especially when it involves a constitutional question. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] voted against the amendment because in my judgment he thinks it is unconstitutional, and is not willing to undertake to limit the power of the President of the United States under the Constitution by any such proposition. For a little while I want to dscuss this point, and I ask unanimous consent to have the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD upon this point of the Mann-Cullop amendment if I do not have time to finish it. The Constitution, Article II, section 2, provides:

SEC. 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The Constitution has vested in the President of the United States the power to make these appointments, and that is, therefore, a constitutional prerogative, a constitutional power. Congress can not make these appointments. If Congress can not make them, Congress has not the power to tell the President how they shall be made. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has been designated by Congress under the Constitution as the power to make these appointments. The Constitution makes it plain that this House has no power to appoint to such an office as contemplated in this bill. The moment Congress puts it in the power of the President to make this appointment, then he makes it under the Constitution. Can you delegate power under the Constitution to the President and take it away at the same time? This power is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by special enactment may be vested in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. It follows that the House has no power to prescribe the conditions under which it shall be exercised. If the House has power to prescribe the conditions contained in this amendment, then why can they not stretch this power to still other conditions until this constitutional provision has been entirely wiped out?

It is not a question of whether we think such a law would be beneficial, for if it is an encroachment upon the President's prerogative as fixed by the Constitution, then it is our sworn duty to uphold the Constitution until it is changed in the manner provided therein.

The Secretary of War under President Jackson quotes the President as holding that—

Upon the preservation of the Constitution, as well in its partition of duties as in its limitations upon their exercise, depends the stability of this Government which the people have established.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not the mere fact that the President had to make public the indorsements sent to him regarding the appointment of a candidate for office take away some of his constitutional privileges?

Mr. WEBB. Would it take them away?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Of course it would.

Mr. MADDEN. In what way? It does not take the power of appointment away.

Mr. WEBB. The power of appointment includes the right to pass upon the recommendations and indorsements of applicants.

Mr. MADDEN. Not necessarily.

Mr. WEBB. They are part of the same transaction.

Mr. MADDEN. Not necessarily.

Mr. WEBB. I will deal with that in a moment if the gentleman will allow me to come to it.

But the advocates of this amendment will contend that the simple provision requiring "the President to make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge" does not in any way interfere with his right of appointment. A proviso, such as is used in this amendment, is defined to be "a limitation or exception to a grant made or authority conferred, the effect of which is to declare that the one shall not operate or the other be exercised unless in the case provided." It always implies a condition, unless subsequent words change it to a covenant. This amendment when examined, apart from any constitutional provision, would mean that the President is only authorized to make this appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on condition that he make public all indorsements; otherwise he is not authorized.

The act contemplates that the exercise of the power shall be dependent upon the compliance with the terms of the proviso, and yet the language used makes it impossible to comply until after the appointment is made, and fixes no limit of time. Would the appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate be nullified by the subsequent failure of the President?

In 1860 the House passed an appropriation bill which contained various items, among which was the appropriation—

For the completion of the Washington Aqueduct, $500,000, to be expended according to the plans and estimates of Capt. Meigs and under his superintendence: Provided, That the office of engineer of the Potomac Waterworks is hereby abolished and its duties shall hereafter be discharged by the chief engineer of the Washington Aqueduct.

President Buchanan in his message to the House of Representatives on June 25 expressed approval of the appropriation "for the wise and beneficial object," but made it clear to the House that he did not acknowledge their right to interfere with the right of the President to be "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." After placing a strained construction upon the objectionable clause in order to relieve it of its constitutional objection, and after pointing out the disastrous effects it would have if given its literal meaning, he says:

Under these circumstances I have deemed it but fair to inform Congress that while I do not consider the bill unconstitutional, this is only because, in my opinion, Congress did not intend by the language which they have employed to interfere with my absolute authority to order Capt. Meigs to any other service I might deem expedient. My perfect right still remains, notwithstanding the clause, to send him away from Washington to any part of the Union to superintend the erection of a fortification or on any other appropriate duty.

In concluding his message President Buchanan adds the following:

It is not improbable that another question of grave importance may arise out of this clause. Is the appropriation conditional and will it fail provided I do not deem it proper that it shall be expended under the superintendence of Capt. Meigs? This is a question which shall receive serious consideration, because upon its decision may depend whether the completion of the waterworks shall be arrested for another season.

The rights of the House to demand information from the Executive are briefly but accurately stated in the resolution embodied in the report from the Committee on Indian Affairs made to the House by Mr. James Cooper, of Pennsylvania, upon the message of President Tyler, in which he had declined to furnish to the House information as to the affairs of the Cherokee Indians, and as to frauds upon them. The first resolution, which was adopted by a vote of 140 to 8, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has the right to demand from the Executive such information as may be in his possession relating to subjects of the deliberations of the House and within the sphere of its legitimate powers.

This is all the House should ever claim. This same report goes on to discuss the matter and attempts to make it plain to the President that they recognize his rights, as follows:

This, it will be remarked, does not include any assertion of right on the part of the House to demand from the Executive the information in his possession relating to negotiations with foreign Governments or appointments to office. By the Constitution the power of making treaties is vested in the President and Senate. The House has no participation in the treaty-making power, nor in that of appointment to office—

And so forth.

President Washington, in a message to the House of Representatives of the 30th of March, 1796, declined to comply with a request contained in a resolution of that body to lay before them—a copy of the instructions to the ministers of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, together with the correspondence and other documents relating to the said treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiations may render improper to be disclosed.

While this resolution seeks to review the exercise of the power by the President of making treaties, as contained in this same paragraph of the Constitution, what is said by the President is equally applicable in the case now under discussion. The President closed his message to the House with the following:

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duties of my office, under all the circumstances of the case, forbid a compliance with your request.

The fact that this amendment requires the information to be given to the public and not to this House but weakens the contention. The House can have no more power to demand information for the public than for its own use. It will not be contended by the friends of this amendment that it is intended to procure information for the House bearing upon pending legislation. Its real object is to supervise and review the acts of the Chief Executive.

In 1886 the Senate called for the documents and papers filed in the Department of Justice in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama, and having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent. Answering this request of the Senate, Mr. Cleveland, in a message on March 1, 1886, among other things, said:

While, therefore, I am constrained to deny the right of the Senate to the papers and documents described, so far as the right to the same is based upon the claim that they are in any view of the subject official, I am also led unequivocally to dispute the right of the Senate, by the aid of any documents whatever, or in any way save through the judicial process of trial on impeachment, to review or reverse the acts of the Executive in the suspension, during the recess of the Senate, of Federal officials.

The requests and demands which by the score have for nearly three months been presented to the different departments of the Government, whatever may be their form, have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my executive discretion and executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people from whom I have so lately received the sacred trust of office. My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistrate, which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance with the demand.

That was passed by the House of Representatives and had been the construction placed on this matter since the days of John Tyler.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman believe that the provision, if incorporated into the law, will allow this condition to arise—a corporation or a trust that might be opposed to the appointment of some man who is named as a possible appointee for the position might, through its officers, send on recommendations to the President of the United States urging the appointment of this man without the knowledge or request of any friend of the man. Is there not danger in that?

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman is exactly right. If the greatest lawyer, a good man, were about to be appointed to office and a trust, some unpopular organization in the United States, were opposed to that good man, the way to defeat him would be to write to the President and tell him that they wanted to see this man made judge, and the President would be either embarrassed or the judge himself would be embarrassed after the appointment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that would afford a reason for repudiating that plank of the platform?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, well, that has been thrashed out so much that I do not care to take the time in discussing it. I know there is some platform declaration commending this kind of legislation, but platforms are not binding on a man's conscience when he comes to construe the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is now referring to a constitutional question.

Mr. WEBB. I think it is a credit to any man who voted one way and, after studying the question, because he was convinced that he ought not to do it under the Constitution, for him to change his vote rather than stick to his old opinion.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. The inquiry of the gentleman from California, in which the gentleman from North Carolina concurred, was not directed to the constitutional question at all, but to the matter of policy.

Mr. WEBB. I know it was not.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman's contention is the Democratic platform commended the House of Representatives for inserting an unconstitutional provision?

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman knows how platforms are made.

Mr. MANN. I know; but I am talking about this contention.

Mr. WEBB. They commended that as a matter of policy; they had not discussed or studied the constitutional side of it.

Mr. MANN. That was molasses to catch flies.

Mr. WEBB. They voted upon that question without having to put their hands upon a Bible and swear to support the Constitution and they recommended that as a policy. When we come to vote here we come with the knowledge that we put our hands upon the Bible, swearing to support the Constitution, the greatest instrument, which is our chart and compass, and, as it has been called, the greatest instrument that ever came from the mind of man.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not a fact the same argument was made when the original Cullop amendment was adopted by the House that the gentleman is making, that the very same question was brought out which the gentleman from California has suggested?

Mr. WEBB. I did not hear it, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. In the passage of the civil office tenure act did not both branches of Congress, by an overwhelming majority, write this very provision into the law of the land and did it not remain there for many, many years?

Mr. WEBB. They never provided it for the appointment of Federal judges, and never have and never will and never ought to, as long as the Constitution remains unchanged on this point.

Mr. CULLOP. Did not it apply to every appointment and every removal that the President made?

Mr. WEBB. No; and as my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] suggests, that was passed when the Constitution was silent under the clash of arms in the United States.

Mr. CULLOP. But did it not go on for more than 30 years after the war closed?

Mr. WEBB. I do not yield any further to my friend.

Mr. CULLOP. And the Executive was changed.

Mr. WEBB. I say again, whatever may have been legislation with regard to minor officers which the Constitution provides for, Congress has never passed any such amendment as this with reference to the appointment of Federal judges, never will, and never should. I take it as almost a reflection upon the President of the United States to put in such a provision. It is an admission that you do not trust him; and if you do not do so, you had better abolish your form of Government. You can not tie strings around everything you would expect him to do, because there are some people just about as good as those who want to hold the strings.

Mr. GORDON. How does it interfere with the President's right to appoint wholly regardless of any recommendations that might be made?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Mr. GORDON. Then how does it interfere with the constitutional power to appoint?

Mr. WEBB. I fear he will not sign the bill. We put it up to him as a condition on which he shall make the appointment.

Mr. GORDON. But you just said it did not interfere with the right to appoint in any way?

Mr. WEBB. Of course; it does not. The President, I fear, will not sign the bill, if you put this proposition up to him, if he thinks it is unconstitutional. If he should sign the bill with this proviso in it, he might feel bound to make the recommendations public.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said that this gave evidence of distrust of the President. Did the gentleman from North Carolina have it in his mind that he would not trust the President when he voted for this amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I did not. It came up here one day several years ago like a flash of lightning out of a clear sky. I have not studied the question, and I had no idea of reflecting on anybody.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am citing in this speech numbers of cases similar to this where the House attempted to violate these constitutional provisions and the President has declined to accede to the request of the House. He has as strict a prerogative within his constitutional sphere as you gentlemen have in yours. You must not trespass upon his, and he will not trespass upon yours. The three cardinal principles on which this Government rests are those which separate the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government. The House attempted this sort of thing in Gen. Grant's time.

In 1876 President Grant declined to answer an inquiry of the House as to whether or not he had performed any Executive acts at a distance from the seat of government in the following language:

I have never hesitated and shall not hesitate to communicate to Congress, and to either branch thereof, all the information which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to give or which my judgment may suggest to me or a request from either House may indicate to me will be useful in the discharge of the appropriate duties confided to them. I fail, however, to find in the Constitution of the United States the authority given to the House of Representatives (one branch of the Congress in which is vested the legislative power of the Government) to require of the Executive, an independent branch of the Government, coordinate with the Senate and House of Representatives, an account of his discharge of his appropriate and purely executive offices, acts, and duties, either as to when, where, or how performed.

What the House of Representatives may require as a right in its demand upon the Executive for information is limited to what is necessary for the proper discharge of its powers of legislation or impeachment. The inquiry in the resolution of the House as to where Executive acts have within the last seven years been performed and at what distance from any particular spot, or for how long a period at any one time, etc., does not necessarily belong to the province of legislation. It does not profess to be asked for that object.

By a message dated September 30, 1890, President Benjamin Harrison returned to the House of Representatives, without his approval, the joint resolution declaring the retirement of Capt. Charles B. Shivers, of the United States Army, legal and valid, and that he is entitled as such officer to his pay. The President says:

It is undoubtedly competent for Congress by an act or joint resolution to authorize the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, to appoint Capt. Shivers to be a captain in the Army of the United States and to place him upon the retired list. It is also perfectly competent, by suitable legislation, for Congress to give to this officer the pay of this grade during the interval of time when he was improperly carried upon the Army lists. But the joint resolution, which I herewith return, does not attempt to deal with the case in that way. It undertakes to declare that the retirement of Capt. Shivers was legal and valid, and that he always has been and is entitled to his pay as such officer. I do not think this is a competent method of giving the relief intended.

The message states the facts to be that Capt. Shivers was summarily dismissed from the Army by order of the President on July 15, 1863. On August 11, 1863, an order was issued revoking this order of dismissal and restoring Capt. Shivers to duty as an officer of the Army. On December 30, 1864, Capt. Shivers, by proper order, was placed on the retired list of the Army. The Supreme Court (114 U. S., 619) had decided that the President had the authority to so separate an officer from the service, and that having been thus separated he could not be restored except by nomination to the Senate and confirmation thereby. The Attorney General therefore gave an opinion that Capt. Shivers was not an officer on the retired list of the Army.

This message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and was not acted on further.

While not questioning the right of the House to decline to appropriate for a diplomatic office, President Grant protested against its assumption that it might give directions as to that service. On August 15, 1876, President Grant sent the following message to the House:

In announcing as I do that I have attached my signature of official approval to the act making appropriations for the Consular and Diplomatic Service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, it is my duty to call attention to a provision in the act directing that notice be sent to certain of the diplomatic and consular officers of the Government "to close their offices."

In the literal sense of this direction it would be an invasion of the constitutional prerogatives and duty of the Executive.

* * * * * * *

In calling attention to the passage which I have indicated I assume that the intention of the provision is only to exercise the constitutional prerogative of Congress over the expenditures of the Government and to fix a time at which the compensation of certain diplomatic and consular officers shall cease, and not to invade the constitutional rights of the Executive, which I should be compelled to resist, and my present object is not to discuss or dispute the wisdom of failing to appropriate for several officers, but to guard against the construction that might possibly be placed on the language used as implying a right in the legislative branch to direct the closing or discontinuing of any of the diplomatic or consular offices of the Government.

The message was debated at some length, and in the course of the discussion reference was made to the precedent in the case of Mr. Harvey, whom President Johnson appointed minister to Portugal. The Congress declined for a time to appropriate for his salary, but later did so. The message was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, no action on the part of the House being contemplated.

The question suggests itself, For what purpose is it desired that these indorsements should be made public? Whatever the House might think of the indorsements it would, when published, be helpless to change the appointment. If an unfit man was named as judge, it would have the right to prefer charges against him and impeach him. These charges would have to be based upon misconduct in office and not upon objectional indorsements. The public would not have this power, but could only criticize. There is no law to prevent any person from indorsing another for office. There would be no way to ascertain what weight the President gave to any particular indorsement. He might act upon personal information gained in the course of many casual conversations which would be difficult, if not impossible, to concisely state. It would be manifestly unfair to the President to have him judged in the public forum upon the formal indorsements. Let him be judged by results. If he makes a wise appointment, the public will know it and applaud; if unwise, they will not be slow to condemn. He is already accountable to the people who elect him and should be given a fair trial.

The future of this Government depends largely upon our vigilance in observing the limits of power set for the several departments of the Government.

If this amendment were not unconstitutional, still this House would have no right to assume that it possesses superior wisdom and virtue, and therefore could justify its right to demand superior power to review the acts of the Executive.

A just regard for the wisdom, virtue, and constitutional power of the Executive will insure a divided responsibility which, in the opinion of the framers of the Constitution, would guarantee better government.

As said by President Washington, regarding the right of the House of Representatives to demand papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power, "to admit such right would be to establish a dangerous precedent." While the information sought by this amendment may not within itself have far-reaching effect, and by many may be regarded as a safeguard rather than a pitfall, yet, as stated by President Jackson, "precedents established for good purposes are easily perverted to bad ones."

The logical and far-reaching effects which should naturally be expected as a result of discarding the bounds of power set by the Constitution and starting on this policy of encroachment are forcibly pointed out in the speech of Mr. Buck delivered in opposition to the resolution, already referred to, calling upon President Washington for documents and correspondence in regard to a treaty with Great Britain. He said, in part:

I am opposed to the resolution now under consideration, not from an apprehension that the papers referred to will not bear the public scrutiny or from a belief that there would be the least reluctance on the part of the Executive to deliver them on account of any such apprehensions of his; but I am opposed to the resolution in point of principle, because I conceive those papers can be of no use to us, unless to gratify feelings of resentment or of vain curiosity. As I would never sacrifice principle to these motives and thereby fix a precedent pernicious in its consequences, I hope for the indulgence of the House while I offer my sentiments upon the subject. * * *

But if we are to take upon ourselves the right of judging whether it was expedient to make the treaty or not, whether it is as good a one as might have been obtained or not, and if we are to assume the power of judging upon the merits as well as the constitutionality of it, then those papers may be necessary; and if we possess the power of thus judging, then we may equally possess the right to call for those papers. But from whence do we derive this right and power? Have the people, when coolly deliberating upon and forming the Constitution, which is the expression of their dispassionate will, in that Constitution given us this right? No; not a syllable in the Constitution that ever intimates the idea. Do we possess the right merely because we are the representatives of the people? No; that can not be, for we are their representatives only for particular purposes, and the Constitution has prescribed to us our bounds, and assigned to us the limits of our powers as well as to the Executive. Are we to derive this right from popular opposition to the treaty, and from thence say that it is the will of the Nation that we should exercise this right of inquiry? Is, then, popular clamor, which originates in discontent, fostered in violence and passion, and stimulated by the intrigues of interested and ambitious individuals, to be taken as the dispassionate will of the Nation? If so, how are we to designate and mark out the numbers of the discontented? Are we to learn it from inflammatory newspaper publications, teeming with invectives against Government and its measures, and not carrying even the appearance of reason with them? These can furnish no data by which to determine whether it is one-tenth or even one-thousandth part of the Nation that are dissatisfied. * * * If so, where shall we stop? If we, by an assumption of power, may invade the prerogatives of the people vested in the President as their representative in making treaties, and may rifle the sacred deposit of their confidential correspondence with foreign nations, and judge upon the merits of a treaty, then may we reverse the judgment of the President and Senate and annul the treaty. Who is then to make the next? Is it supposable that the President will again attempt it, when the principle is fixed that he and the Senate are not the ultimate judges of its merits? No; to me this is absurd. We must, then, take the whole business to ourselves, and become the negotiators as well as the ratifiers of a treaty; and if we may do this upon the same principle whenever there shall be a popular clamor raised against the persons appointed to the judiciary department we may interpose, call on the President for the reasons of his making the appointment, declare it injudicious, withhold appropriations for the salaries, and engross all the judiciary powers to ourselves. Upon the same principle we may ultimately determine upon our own adjournments, declare our sittings perpetual, constitute ourselves the judges and executioners of the law, and become the accusers, judges, and executioners of our fellow citizens. This would be forming an aristocracy with a witness; and where then would be the boasted rights of America, for which she fought and bled?

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope we may have a vote on this Cullop amendment from a conscientious constitutional standpoint, as an interpretation of the Constitution as to our divided powers of Government, the distinction between the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. We have no right or authority to encroach upon the power of the President when he comes to make these appointments, any more than he would have the right to send for your manuscript or recommendations when you made a certain speech on the floor of the House. You are independent in your sphere, as the Executive is independent in his sphere.

Mr. GORDON. What is your view generally—and I submit this question because you are chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and your judgment is entitled to great consideration—of what are the rights of the public as to going to any of the departments of the Government and obtaining information concerning applicants for office?

Mr. WEBB. There is a good deal to be said in favor of that sort of a suggestion and a good deal against it. A bad but powerful man may be an applicant for office, and you and I may want to write to the President and tell him why this man should not be appointed, and tell him confidentially the reasons why we think he is a bad man. You would not want your letter made public. But the fact that correspondence is more or less sacred and guarded by these officers is one reason why men confide in them and tell them the truth.

Mr. NORTON. The question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] brings to my mind the question of whether you believed or thought that the public should be entitled to examine the records in the different departments? Now, I should like to ask this: Do you think that Members of Congress should have the right to examine the records in the different departments? I know personally that that privilege is not granted to at least Republican Members.

Mr. WEBB. It would take quite a while to answer my friend's question according to my view, and it is aside from the merits of this question, and I hope he will not take my time to discuss that. It is not now before the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a short question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOP. I wish to say that if this amendment were adopted it would prevent men from fooling candidates for office. They could not indorse all of them without it being made public, and it would eliminate a lot of hypocrisy.

Mr. WEBB. I am not going to agree to violate the Constitution of the United States in order to prevent the making of political hypocrites.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the three amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] did that two hours ago.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I want to modify my motion and, with the permission of the House, to move to concur in the first and third amendments and nonconcur in amendment No. 2.

Mr. MANN. It is six of one and half a dozen of the other.

The SPEAKER. Both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] ask that these amendments be voted on separately.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. I was going to ask that we have a vote by a roll call, but I will not make that request now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, of the House print, after the word "therein," strike out the colon and the proviso, as follows: "Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the form of this amendment, those who wish to vote for this amendment will vote "no." Is that correct? Those who wish to retain this provision in the bill will vote "no"?

The SPEAKER. Those who wish to retain the Cullop amendment will vote "no." Those who want to vote against it will vote "aye."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there any way by which a vote can be had against the Cullop amendment and then a vote also had against the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are a number of us who are not in favor of the Cullop amendment and at the same time are not in favor of the bill. We would like to have a chance to express both views, if possible.

The SPEAKER. There is no way that the Chair knows of doing that at this time. Those who are in favor of the Cullop amendment will vote "no." Those that are opposed to it will vote "aye."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. There has been no demand for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that. He was not putting the question by yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to have the Speaker state the question on which the vote is to be taken. The Speaker just now stated that question erroneously. He said those in favor of the Cullop amendment would vote "aye." Those opposed will vote "no." It is just the reverse.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair has correctly stated it. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 202, answered "present" 4, not voting 119, as follows:

[Roll No. 87.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. SINNOTT.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. SLOAN.

Mr. BRODBECK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. BRODBECK. No; I was not. I was on the way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. GILL. I do not think I can bring myself within the rule. I did not get into the Hall until after my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, under his statement, does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. GILL. Then I will vote present.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur is rejected, which is equivalent to disagreeing to the amendment. The Clerk will report the third amendment.

The Clerk reported Senate amendment No. 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is the third amendment.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What becomes of the second amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that later. They did not want to concur in that, but did want to concur in this one.

Mr. MANN. I know; but what "they" want does not determine the order in which amendments shall be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 2, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the southern district of the State of Georgia senior in commission such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but one district judge in said district."

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur is rejected, which is equivalent to a disagreement. The Clerk will report the third amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 3, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the senior circuit judge of the circuit in which the southern district of Georgia lies shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district between the several district judges therein."

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP), there were—ayes 35, noes 101.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to concur in the third amendment, which is equivalent to a disagreement.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House request a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, before the conferees are appointed I send the following motion to the Clerk's desk. I believe this is the proper time to instruct the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CULLOP moves that the House conferees be instructed not to concur in Senate amendment No. 1, which is to strike out, on page 1, line 9, after the word "therein," the words "Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WEBB. I want to know if this is debatable.

Mr. CULLOP. I move the previous question.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman can hardly take me off my feet to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has already claimed the floor.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I hope the House will pass no such resolution as that. The conferees will understand their duty and will obey the mandate of this House. It would be an unusual proceeding to instruct the conferees in this fashion and thus foreclose any conference whatever, because the Senate would never meet the House conferees if that resolution should be adopted, as well as an affront to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall the fact that this House, in this Congress, has already passed a similar instruction on another bill, and that the Senate conferees readily met the House conferees when the House conferees were instructed in the identical language of the instruction now offered?

Mr. WEBB. On what bill was that?

Mr. CULLOP. On the Pennsylvania judgeship.

Mr. MANN. On the Philadelphia judgeship.

Mr. WEBB. The House finally yielded on that anyway and struck out the Cullop amendment; and I understand that the Senate conferees never met ours officially after the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MANN. That is another proposition.

Mr. WEBB. That was after it had been voted on several times.

Mr. MANN. But there was no objection on the part of the Senate to appointing conferees, although the House conferees were instructed in this identical way.

It will relieve the gentleman of much embarrassment, because I do not think the Speaker would be warranted in appointing three conferees who had voted against the practical instruction of the House. The gentleman from North Carolina and the next gentleman on that side of the House on the Judiciary Committee do not represent the sentiment of the House under the vote just taken, and I should think that the gentleman would welcome the instruction.

Mr. WEBB. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois knows, although it does not represent our sentiment, that we will represent the sentiment of the House in conference, and he need not worry about that. I have no personal interest in this bill; it is my desire to carry out the mandate of the House. I have done my duty as chairman of the committee, and that is all I expect to do. I will carry out the mandate of the House, and the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Indiana need not worry about that.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from North Carolina yielded the floor?

Mr. WEBB. No; I have not, but I am about to yield the floor. I do not think these instructions ought to be adopted. The conferees will carry out the mandate of the House, and I think it would be a reflection on the House conferees to adopt such instructions.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in reply for just a moment, and I assure all that the motion means no reflection on the conferees. They ought to desire the instructions. I would be the last to cast such a reflection. Only a few moments ago the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, for whom I have the highest regard, stated he was opposed to what is known as the Cullop amendment from conscientious conviction, and hence the adoption of this motion will enable him to support the amendment in conference because of the instruction given the conferees by this House, and thereby save him from embarrassment. I take it that he will be one of the House conferees because of his position. The adoption of this instruction would relieve him of all difficulty in the discharge of his duty as a conferee. There can be no objection to it, and in this Congress on a similar bill to this we passed a resolution by more than a hundred majority instructing the conferees on this same question, and it was considered no reflection upon them. The Senate did meet the House conferees and had a conference a number of times. Consequently the passage of this resolution can not be considered a reflection upon the conferees. It is not a reflection upon anybody. It is simply to show the Senate and the conferees of the Senate that the House means what it says upon this proposition, and that it has a right to be understood upon it.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Had not the House and Senate conferees had several conferences upon the matter in relation to the Pennsylvania bill the gentleman speaks of and reported a disagreement before the House adopted instructions to the conferees?

Mr. CULLOP. It had not at the time we disagreed to the Senate amendment, and the RECORD shows that we then instructed the conferees at the same time, just as we are proposing to do it now. The gentleman from Georgia, an experienced parliamentarian, knows we could not have done it at any other time.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Did not the House later reverse itself, notwithstanding its instructions, by knocking out the Cullop amendment?

Mr. CULLOP. Some time afterwards, and only after the gentleman from Pennsylvania importuned some of the Members to change their votes, as a personal accommodation doubtless to him; under his importunities they did change their votes.

Mr. WEBB. My suggestion is that these instructions are useless, because if any effort be made to have it adopted you will have a vote on it in the House.

Mr. CULLOP. It is not, in my judgment, useless at this time. The fact is that the conferees, if appointed as is generally done, are not in favor of this amendment, and there should be instructions from the House. To instruct will do no harm, but, on the contrary, be of benefit in disposing of the question. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves the previous question on his resolution to instruct the conferees.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution.

The question was being taken when Mr. CULLOP demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 168, nays 125, answered "present" 3, not voting 127, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. BELL of California.

Mr. SIMS with Mr. SLOAN.

Mr. BARNHART with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. COLLIER with Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. LINTHICUM with Mr. CARY.

Mr. LLOYD with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LOBECK with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY with Mr. DANFORTH.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CULLOP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in view of the instruction of the House, I ask that the Speaker appoint as conferees Messrs. MCGILLICUDDY, THOMAS, and VOLSTEAD, all three of whom voted for the Cullop amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. VOLSTEAD.

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing in the RECORD a speech made on Sunday by my colleague, Mr. MARTIN, on the subject of the American flag.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by his colleague, Mr. MARTIN, on the American flag. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE BUREAU.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania on what subject?

Mr. MOORE. On the subject of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to object to the gentleman's request, but I would not like to have the House get into a political discussion at this time.

Mr. MOORE. It is not a political controversy. I have some accurate information which the House ought to have, and I think I can state it in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for waiving his right to object, because what I have to say is timely and I think the House ought to be fully informed. A few mornings ago we were informed in the dispatches from Berlin, Germany, that the steamship Evelyn, flying the American flag, had gone down, sunk by a mine. This morning we are informed by similar dispatches from the same city that the steamship Carib, flying the American flag, went down in very much the same fashion. It ought to be known to the people of this country that both of these vessels were foreign built, each being constructed at Glasgow, Scotland. It ought to be known, too, that each of these vessels was wrecked upon the American coast, one 14 years after construction and the other 16 years after construction, and that in each instance they were able to obtain the right to use the American flag because they had been repaired on this side of the water. The Evelyn was constructed in Glasgow in 1883. She was wrecked on the American coast in 1897. The Carib was built in Glasgow in 1882, and she was wrecked on the American coast in 1898. Each was able to obtain the right to sail under the American flag because each had been repaired in this country.

Yesterday I said about all I care to say on the legislation that has been passed with respect to foreign vessels wrecked on the American coast. I wish now to say that by virtue of the war-risk law passed by this Congress and signed by the President September 2, 1914, it was possible for exporters who desired to send cotton abroad to obtain the use of these two ships, both of which had been wrecked and thus obtained the invaluable privilege of the American flag, to go into the war zone on dangerous errands. I call attention to the very significant fact that neither of the vessels was of very great value except for the privilege of using the American flag. I call attention to the further fact that even with the American flag they could not obtain from private companies insurance sufficient to indemnify the cargoes they were to carry into what might be called contraband or belligerent territory. It was not until the Government of the United States stepped in and passed the war-risk law and guaranteed the hulls and the cargoes that these vessels were able to sail into those dangerous and hazardous zones.

The direct result of the act of September 2, 1914, therefore, has been that these two old foreign-built ships, wrecked upon the American coast and using the American flag, were insured by the people of the United States under the law, so that the loss upon the hulls will not be borne by the owners and the loss upon the cargoes will not be borne by the consignors or the consignees. Whatever loss there is, up to the value of the insurance, will be paid by the people of the United States.

The Evelyn was insured to the extent of $100,000 upon her hull and her cargo was insured to the extent of $301,000, a total of $401,000, guaranteed by the people of the United States upon cotton going to the war zone. For that insurance the United States received a premium of $13,030, about 3 per cent. That is to say, we staked $401,000 of the people's money against $13,030, which we received in the form of a premium.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not yield now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Just for a question.

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How much has the Government received in the way of premiums for war-risk insurance up to this time?

Mr. MOORE. I will give the figures in a moment. The Carib was insured on her hull for $22,253——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not like to object——

Mr. MOORE. I shall not digress from a statement of the facts, if the gentleman from Alabama will permit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MOORE. The Carib was insured on her hull for $22,253, on her cargo for $235,850. The total amount of the people's money thus at risk on the Carib and her cargo was $258,103. The premium paid was $7,965.62. That is to say, for $7,965.62 received on the Carib we staked $258,103 of the people's money.

Now, before I reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] I desire to say that the total premiums on those two ships was $20,995, or approximately $21,000, as against a loss of $659,103, approximately $660,000. That is to say, we stand to lose $660,000 of the people's money for $21,000 in premiums.

As to the question of the gentleman from Missouri, I will answer directly. My information from the War Risk Bureau this morning is that the total amount of premiums received on all business thus far done is $1,502,302—more than a million and a half of dollars in round figures—and to be fair with the bureau and with the gentleman from Missouri, a very large proportion of that is protected, because a number of insured cargoes have arrived at their destination. But a million and a half dollars of money derived in premiums insuring owners against loss on cargoes and hulls of these old vessels, wrecked or otherwise, is only one side of the story. The risk we took to secure those premiums of $1,500,000 was $55,000,000, and that is what we stood to lose on that million and a half for which the gentleman claims credit.

Mr. BARTLETT. Can the gentleman give the figures as to what amount in premiums have been earned?

Mr. MOORE. A million and a half earned in premiums.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield, if to anyone?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Up to date we have earned in premiums $640,848, and this is the first loss.

Mr. MOORE. Up to date we have lost $659,000, and we stood to lose $55,000,000——

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOORE. Yesterday my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] made an eloquent appeal for somebody to stop this hazardous business into which we are plunged headlong. As a matter of fact, there is no telling what the volume of the risk will be. We stood to lose $55,000,000, less what has been marked off on cargoes that have gone through. I understand policies have already expired to the amount of $25,000,000, but we still stand to lose $30,000,000, and on two ships we have actually lost $659,000. The surety business is all right when the premiums are coming in, but we are just beginning to hear of the losses, and they seldom grow less.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not; I have not the time.

Mr. BORLAND. I wanted to ask the gentleman to put in another fact——

Mr. MOORE. Yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] rose and said that somebody ought to stop this business; that somebody ought to stop these vessels carrying contraband and conditional contraband into the war zone, inviting complications. Yes; somebody ought to rise and say to the speculators who want to take these chances with ships and lives in the danger zones that the risk belongs to them and not to the people of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not. If anyone shall seek to apply the remedy for those losses and those perils, perhaps it may be found in the war-risk law. You provided in that law that the President shall have discretion to stop this business. He can exercise that discretion if he will. He can check this tremendous hazard against which the peace and the money of the people of this country is being staked. Section 9 of the war-risk bill provides:

That the President is authorized whenever, in his judgment, the necessity for further war insurance by the United States shall have ceased to exist, to suspend the operations of this act in so far as it authorizes insurance by the United States against loss or damage by risks of war—

And so forth.

I will insert the rest of it in the RECORD. The time has come for the President to act if he cares to do so. Two vessels have already gone down——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, in extension, I am hopeful the resolutions I offered yesterday to acquire detailed information from the Secretary of the Treasury as to the business of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may be passed in order that we may know the nature of the cargoes that have been insured and the volume of risk which the country has assumed. The figures I have just presented show that our total risk up to date was $55,000,000, reduced, as claimed by the bureau, to $30,000,000 because a number of vessels with cargoes insured have successfully run the gantlet. That the losses in the bureau are only beginning with the destruction of the Evelyn and the Carib is patent to those who have any knowledge of the surety business. It is more than probable that we shall hear of war-risk claims for many years after the President has seen fit to discontinue the bureau or after it has died by limitation. We are told that all of the maritime nations have established war-risk bureaus. Many of them are actively engaged in the conflict, and none of them are so happily situated to avoid trouble as is the United States. This morning's papers contain a dispatch from Liverpool indicating that the war-risk losses of the British company are "very slight." They may be slight considering the necessity that has surrounded a country engaged in war. Even at that, the six months' losses of the British War Risk Association appear to mount up in American money to $26,000,000. I append a dispatch bearing upon this subject:

BRITISH SHIPPING LOSSES SMALL, DECLARES ISMAY—CARGOES DESTROYED ONLY SEVEN-TENTHS OF 1 PER CENT OF TOTAL VALUE.

LIVERPOOL, February 23.

J. Bruce Ismay, presiding to-day at a meeting of the Liverpool and London War Risks Association, said that the shipping entered in this association was valued at £80,000,000 ($400,000,000); that the vessels identified with the association which had been lost during six months of the war were valued at only £850,000 and the cargoes at £4,500,000. The cargo losses represented only 14 shillings per cent (seven-tenths of 1 per cent) of the total value of the cargoes at risk.

This, he said, constituted a magnificent tribute to the efficacy of the protection afforded by the British Navy, and showed that the submarine peril had been greatly exaggerated.

While I am privileged to do so, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly as to the remarks made by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] yesterday and my Mississippi colleague [Mr. HARRISON] this afternoon. These gentlemen refer to the necessity of getting cotton abroad, and the gentleman from Missouri is curious to know exactly what kind of a speech the gentleman would make "if all the cotton of the United States was still held in storage in this country and had no foreign outlet at all." I am sorry the gentleman from Missouri has not listened to what I have previously said upon this side of the cotton question. I have contended that there was a market for cotton in the United States under a protective tariff, but that that market has been very seriously affected in this country because of low-tariff conditions. The intense desire of our Democratic friends to send their cotton abroad rather than to sell it at home is partly responsible for the bank balances in Missouri to which the gentleman refers, as it is also responsible for the failure of industrial establishments in the eastern part of the country to buy up as much raw cotton as they would like to use. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Mississippi should take up the report of the Director of the Census for the month of January to better understand this situation. In January, 1914, when there was no European war and no special complaint about the price of cotton, our cotton exports amounted to 1,052,272 bales. In January, 1915, when the war was on and complaints were heard about the price of cotton, our cotton exports were 1,372,175 bales, or more than 300,000 bales more in war times than in times of peace. It does not appear, therefore, that either the foreigner who uses raw cotton or the planter who sells it had any special cause to complain about the quantity bought or sold in January, 1915. Let us concede that much of this cotton would not have been exported if the Government had not gone into the war-risk insurance business, but while this business has worked well for raw cotton and for foreign manufacturers, who are shipping back tremendous quantities of fabrics into the United States, I do not want my friends to overlook the fact that the same report of the Director of the Census shows that there were 500,000 less cotton spindles active in the United States in January, 1915, than there were in January, 1914. In other words, the increase in cotton exports was at the expense of American industries, and accounts in a large degree for the unemployment that now prevails in the United States. Witness the customhouse statement from New York this morning that German exports to the United States, meaning exports of goods that compete with United States manufactures, have been substantially as great in January, 1915, as they were in January, 1914. If our friends upon the other side can see no danger in purchasing antiquated foreign-built vessels, giving them an American register, insuring them with the people's money, and sending them to war zones, they should at least recognize the injustice done the industries of the United States by the persistence with which our foreign trade in cotton is encouraged to break down the textile industries of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the same question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Georgia judgeship bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20347) entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. DU PONT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRACTICE OF PHARMACY AND SALE OF POISON IN CHINA.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6631) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and sale of poison in the consular districts of the United States in China.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6631) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poison in the consular districts of the United States in China.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the bill ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1915, it shall be unlawful in the consular districts of the United States in China for any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States not licensed as a pharmacist within the meaning of this act to conduct or manage any pharmacy, drug, or chemical store, apothecary shop, or other place of business for the retailing, compounding, or dispensing of any drugs, chemicals, or poisons, or for the compounding of physicians' prescriptions, or to keep exposed for sale at retail, any drugs, chemicals, or poisons, except as hereinafter provided, or, except as hereinafter provided, for any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States not licensed as a pharmacist within the meaning of this act to compound, dispense, or sell at retail any drug, chemical, poison, or pharmaceutical preparation upon the prescription of a physician, or otherwise, or to compound physicians' prescriptions, except as an aid to and under the proper supervision of a pharmacist licensed under this act. And it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation owing permanent allegiance to the United States owning partly or wholly or managing a pharmacy, drug store, or other place of business to cause or permit any person other than a licensed pharmacist to compound, dispense, or sell at retail any drug, medicine, or poison except as an aid to and under the proper supervision of a licensed pharmacist: Provided, That where it is necessary for a person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States and owning partly or wholly or managing a pharmacy, drug store, or other place of business to employ Chinese subjects to compound, dispense, or sell at retail any drug, medicine, or poison, such person, firm, corporation, owner, part owner, or manager of a pharmacy, drug store, or other place of business may employ such Chinese subjects when their character, ability, and age of 21 years or over have been certified to by at least two recognized and reputable practitioners of medicine, or two pharmacists licensed under this act whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to interfere with any recognized and reputable practitioner of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary surgery in the compounding of his own prescriptions or to prevent him from supplying to his patients such medicines as he may deem proper, except as hereinafter provided; nor with the exclusively wholesale business of any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States dealing and licensed as pharmacists, or having in their employ at least one person who is so licensed, except as hereinafter provided; nor with the sale by persons, firms, or corporations whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States other than pharmacists of poisonous substances sold exclusively for use in the arts, or as insecticides, when such substances are sold in unbroken packages bearing labels having plainly printed upon them the name of the contents, the word "poison," when practicable the name of at least one suitable antidote, and the name and address of the vender.

SEC. 2. That every person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States now practicing as a pharmacist or desiring to practice as a pharmacist in the consular districts in China shall file with the consul an application, duly verified under oath, setting forth the name and age of the applicant, the place or places at which he pursued and the time spent in the study of pharmacy, the experience which the applicant has had in compounding physicians' prescriptions under the direction of a licensed pharmacist, and the name and location of the school or college of pharmacy, if any, of which he is a graduate, and shall submit evidence sufficient to show to the satisfaction of said consul that he is of good moral character and not addicted to the use of alcoholic liquors or narcotic drugs so as to render him unfit to practice pharmacy: Provided, That applicants shall be not less than 21 years of age and shall have had at least four years' experience in the practice of pharmacy or shall have served three years under the instruction of a regularly licensed pharmacist, and any applicant who has been graduated from a school or college of pharmacy recognized by the proper board of his State, Territory, District of Columbia, or other possession of the United States as in good standing shall be entitled to practice upon presentation of his diploma.

SEC. 3. That if the applicant for license as a pharmacist has complied with the requirements of the preceding section, the consul shall issue to him a license which shall entitle him to practice pharmacy in the consular districts of the United States in China, subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That the license of any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States to practice pharmacy in the consular districts of the United States in China may be revoked by the consul if such person be found to have obtained such license by fraud, or be addicted to the use of any narcotic or stimulant, or to be suffering from physical or mental disease, in such manner and to such extent as to render it expedient that in the interests of the public his license be canceled; or to be of an immoral character; or if such person be convicted in any court of competent jurisdiction of any offense involving moral turpitude. It shall be the duty of the consul to investigate any case in which it is discovered by him or made to appear to his satisfaction that any license issued under the provisions of this act is revocable and shall, after full hearing, if in his judgment the facts warrant it, revoke such license.

SEC. 5. That every license to practice pharmacy shall be conspicuously displayed by the person to whom the same has been issued in the pharmacy, drug store, or place of business, if any, of which the said person is the owner or part owner or manager.

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States, either personally or by servant or agent or as the servant or agent of any other person or of any firm or corporation, to sell, furnish, or give away any cocaine, salts of cocaine, or preparation containing cocaine or salts of cocaine, or morphine or preparation containing morphine or salts of morphine, or any opium or preparation containing opium, or any chloral hydrate or preparation containing chloral hydrate, except upon the original written order or prescription of a recognized and reputable practitioner of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary medicine, which order or prescription shall be dated and shall contain the name of the person for whom prescribed, or, if ordered by a practitioner of veterinary medicine, shall state the kind of animal for which ordered and shall be signed by the person giving the order or prescription. Such order or prescription shall be, for a period of three years, retained on file by the person, firm, or corporation who compounds or dispenses the article ordered or prescribed, and it shall not be compounded or dispensed after the first time except upon the written order of the original prescriber: Provided, That the above provisions shall not apply to preparations containing not more than 2 grains of opium, or not more than one-quarter grain of morphine, or not more than one-quarter grain of cocaine, or not more than 2 grains of chloral hydrate in the fluid ounce, or, if a solid preparation, in 1 avoirdupois ounce. The above provisions shall not apply to preparations sold in good faith for diarrhea and cholera, each bottle or package of which is accompanied by specific directions for use and caution against habitual use, nor to liniments or ointments sold in good faith as such when plainly labeled "for external use only," nor to powder of ipecac and opium, commonly known as Dover's powder, when sold in quantities not exceeding 20 grains: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not be construed to permit the selling, furnishing, giving away, or prescribing for the use of any habitual users of the same any cocaine, salts of cocaine, or preparation containing cocaine or salts of cocaine, or morphine or salts of morphine, or preparations containing morphine or salts of morphine, or any opium or preparation containing opium, or any chloral hydrate or preparation containing chloral hydrate. But this proviso shall not be construed to prevent any recognized or reputable practitioner of medicine whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States from furnishing in good faith for the use of any habitual user of narcotic drugs who is under his professional care such substances as he may deem necessary for their treatment, when such prescriptions are not given or substances furnished for the purpose of evading the provisions of this section. But the provisions of this section shall not apply to sales at wholesale between jobbers, manufacturers, and retail druggists, hospitals, and scientific or public institutions.

SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States to sell or deliver to any other person any of the following-described substances or any poisonous compound, combination, or preparation thereof, to wit: The compounds of and salts of antimony, arsenic, barium, chromium, copper, gold, lead, mercury, silver, and zinc, the caustic hydrates of sodium and potassium, solution or water of ammonia, methyl alcohol, paregoric, the concentrated mineral acids, oxalic and hydrocyanic acids and their salts, yellow phosphorus, Paris green, carbolic acid, the essential oils of almonds, pennyroyal, tansy, rue, and savin; croton oil, creosote, chloroform, cantharides, or aconite, belladonna, bitter almonds, colchicum, cotton root, cocculus indicus, conium, cannabis indica, digitalis, ergot, hyoscyamus, ignatia, lobelia, nux vomica, physostigma, phytolacca, strophanthus, stramonium, veratrum viride, or any of the poisonous alkaloids or alkaloidal salts derived from the foregoing, or any other poisonous alkaloids or their salts, or any other virulent poison, except in the manner following, and, moreover, if the applicant be less than 18 years of age, except upon the written order of a person known or believed to be an adult.

It shall first be learned, by due inquiry, that the person to whom delivery is about to be made is aware of the poisonous character of the substance and that it is desired for a lawful purpose, and the box, bottle, or other package shall be plainly labeled with the name of the substance, the word "Poison," the name of at least one suitable antidote, when practicable, and the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation dispensing the substance. And before delivery be made of any of the foregoing substances, excepting solution or water of ammonia and sulphate of copper, there shall be recorded in a book kept for that purpose the name of the article, the quantity delivered, the purpose for which it is to be used, the date of delivery, the name and address of the person for whom it is procured, and the name of the individual personally dispensing the same; and said book shall be preserved by the owner thereof for at least three years after the date of the last entry therein. The foregoing provisions shall not apply to articles dispensed upon the order of persons believed by the dispenser to be recognized and reputable practitioners of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary surgery: Provided, That when a physician writes upon his prescription a request that it be marked or labeled "Poison" the pharmacist shall, in the case of liquids, place the same in a colored glass, roughened bottle, of the kind commonly known in trade as a "poison bottle," and, in the case of dry substances, he shall place a poison label upon the container. The record of sale and delivery above mentioned shall not be required of manufacturers and wholesalers who shall sell any of the foregoing substances at wholesale to licensed pharmacists, but the box, bottle, or other package containing such substance, when sold at wholesale, shall be properly labeled with the name of the substance, the word "Poison," and the name and address of the manufacturer or wholesaler: Provided further, That it shall not be necessary, in sales either at wholesale or at retail, to place a poison label upon, nor to record the delivery of, the sulphide of antimony, or the oxide or carbonate of zinc, or of colors ground in oil and intended for use as paints, or calomel; nor in the case of preparations containing any of the substances named in this section, when a single box, bottle, or other package, or when the bulk of one-half fluid ounce or the weight of one-half avoirdupois ounce does not contain more than an adult medicinal dose of such substance; nor, in the case of liniments or ointments sold in good faith as such, when plainly labeled "For external use only"; nor, in the case of preparations put up and sold in the form of pills, tablets, or lozenges, containing any of the substances enumerated in this section and intended for internal use, when the dose recommended does not contain more than one-fourth of an adult medicinal dose of such substance.

For the purpose of this and of every other section of this act no box, bottle, or other package shall be regarded as having been labeled "Poison" unless the word "Poison" appears conspicuously thereon, printed in plain, uncondensed gothic letters in red ink.

SEC. 8. That no person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States seeking to procure in the consular districts of the United States in China any substance the sale of which is regulated by the provisions of this act shall make any fraudulent representations so as to evade or defeat the restrictions herein imposed.

SEC. 9. That every person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States owning, partly owning, or managing a drug store or pharmacy shall keep in his place of business a suitable book or file, in which shall be preserved for a period of not less than three years the original of every prescription compounded or dispensed at such store or pharmacy, or a copy of such prescription, except when the preservation of the original is required by section 6 of this act. Upon request the owner, part owner, or manager of such store shall furnish to the prescribing physician, or to the person for whom such prescription was compounded or dispensed, a true and correct copy thereof. Any prescription required by section 6 of this act, and any prescription for, or register of sales of, substances mentioned in section 6 of this act shall at all times be open to inspection by duly authorized consular officers in the consular districts of the United States in China.

No person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States shall, in a consular district, compound or dispense any drug or drugs or deliver the same to any other person without marking on the container thereof the name of the drug or drugs contained therein and directions for using the same.

SEC. 10. That it shall be unlawful for any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States, not legally licensed as a pharmacist, to take, use, or exhibit the title of pharmacist, or licensed or registered pharmacist, or the title of druggist or apothecary, or any other title or description of like import.

SEC. 11. That any person, firm, or corporation, whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States, violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 and not more than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than 1 month and not more than 60 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and if the offense be continuing in its character each week or part of a week during which it continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. And it shall be the duty of the consular and judicial officers of the United States in China to enforce the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That the word "Consul" as used in this act shall mean the consular officer in charge of the district concerned.

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying or revoking any of the provisions of the act of Congress of February 23, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Emperor of China on the 17th day of November, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States the 5th day of October, 1881."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I assume that this is the first instance where our Government has sought to legislate extraterritorially over the affairs of American citizens doing business when domiciled in a foreign country. If I am mistaken in that, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to correct me.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The Senate passed a bill very similar to this one in 1910, but it failed in the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. My question is whether this is not the first instance where our Government has attempted to legislate extraterritorially over our citizens doing business in a foreign country?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; it is the first one that I recall.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire further whether the other Governments who were parties to the convention convened to suppress the opium trade in China passed similar bills applicable to their subjects doing business in China?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. This whole matter was entered into upon the initiative of this Government, and the purpose of the other Governments is to follow the course of this Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. There has been a convention called at the instance of this Government to which the leading European nations were invited, in which a common course was agreed upon for the suppression of the opium trade in China.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I am inquiring whether these other foreign Governments have taken any action in the fulfillment of that convention?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I undertook to answer the gentleman's question by saying that this Government was supposed to act first. This whole proceeding was upon the initiative of this Government. The first opium commission, composed of representatives of this Government and Austria, China, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, Russia, and Siam, was formed upon the initiative of this Government and it made recommendations as to the kind of law that should be enacted by the different nations for the control of their nationals in the free ports of China. That measure passed the Senate in 1910 and failed in the House. Then there was an international conference at The Hague of these same nations in reference to this matter, and it was there agreed that the Chinese Government was to formulate a law that would be satisfactory to them and submit it to these Governments. That law was gotten up by China and by this country, and is based largely upon the antidrug law of the District of Columbia, with certain changes which they thought were proper to make. And this Government is to enact it first, and then the other Governments are to follow.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that this is a penal statute.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The very opening sentence provides for it to take effect on and after January 1, 1915. I direct inquiry to the gentleman whether that should not be changed in view of the fact that unquestionably American pharmacists doing business in these Chinese ports over which there are treaty obligations between China and the United States may not have conformed to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think it ought to be changed to the 1st of January, 1916.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform us whether there are any other countries that have adopted a like bill to this under consideration?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think not, up to this time. I think they will follow very rapidly after we have adopted it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We passed here a year ago last June the so-called Harrison Act, regulating the sale of habit-forming drugs. It has recently gone into effect, or will go into effect on March 1. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the provisions of the Harrison Act are virtually embodied in the bill under consideration?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I am not sufficiently familiar with the Harrison Act to answer that question with any degree of accuracy. My understanding has been, I will say to the gentleman, that this bill is framed upon the District of Columbia law on this subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report shows it was framed with that as a model, and by a certain Mr. Hamilton Wright. Can the gentleman inform us who Mr. Hamilton Wright is?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He is the gentleman who has had charge of the international aspect of the opium work on behalf of this Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it is understood the gentleman intends to offer an amendment substituting "16" for "15"?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. I understand the Government of China has already taken steps to suppress the opium traffic?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes. In 1906 it took very vigorous steps to suppress it, and was thwarted by the Americans, whom they could not control because they did not have jurisdiction over them.

Mr. KAHN. I would like to insert in the RECORD statements uttered by the great Chinese statesman, Li Hung Chang, on the opium traffic, and I ask, Mr. Speaker, that I have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that matter.

The SPEAKER. On what?

Mr. KAHN. To insert in the RECORD some statements of Li Hung Chang on the opium traffic.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and insert some statements of Li Hung Chang on the opium traffic. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. The statement is as follows:

In the autumn of 1906 the Chinese Government determined to bring to an end the practice of opium smoking in China. In support of China's effort the United States immediately proposed to Austria-Hungary, China, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, Russia, and Siam that an international commission should be assembled to study and recommend means by which the Indo-Chinese opium traffic and the collateral traffic to the Philippine Islands and other eastern territories might be brought to an end. That commission assembled at Shanghai in February, 1909, and in the course of its deliberations on the opium problem it was demonstrated that in the three preceding years the Chinese Empire had been flooded with so-called opium remedies largely manufactured by foreigners resident in the treaty ports of China, and that these so-called anti-opium remedies were composed largely of opium and morphine. It therefore appeared that China's heroic effort to suppress the habit of opium smoking would be frustrated because the habit of swallowing opium was about to take the place of the habit of opium smoking.

The International Opium Commission promptly recognied this fact when demonstrated by the Chinese commissioners, and a means to prevent the replacement of the old habit of opium smoking by opium swallowing and the responsibility of foreigners in the treaty ports of China for the new habit had to be thought out.

After a thorough discussion between the American and Chinese commissioners it was decided that the commission as a whole should recommend to their Governments that they apply their national pharmacy laws to their subjects in the consular districts, settlements, and concessions in China, the object being to prevent foreigners in China manufacturing wholesale and placing on the market so-called antiopium remedies which contain nothing but opium and morphine. Therefore the commission as a whole adopted the following resolution, which was introduced by the American delegation:

RESOLUTION 9—INTERNATIONAL OPIUM COMMISSION.

"Be it resolved, That the International Opium Commission recommends that each delegation move its Government to apply its pharmacy laws to its subjects in the consular districts, concessions, and settlements in China."

As the American commissioners, after consultation with the Chinese commissioners, were responsible for this resolution, it was incumbent upon the American Government to be the first to apply any national pharmacy act on the statute books to its subjects resident in its consular districts in China. The only national pharmacy act on the statute books is Public, No. 148, an act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

This act was therefore taken as a model of the act which the Chinese Government expected that the American Government would apply to Americans resident in China under those treaty stipulations which are briefed in another memorandum. The modifications of Public, No. 148, which accompanies this memorandum, was passed by the Senate on June 25, 1910, but failed of action in the House, and the matter has rested until the present moment.

Following upon the unanimous action of the International Opium Commission in condemning the evils associated with the opium traffic, this Government proposed to the other interested Governments that an international conference, composed of delegates with full powers, should meet at The Hague to give the force of law and international agreement to the resolutions of the International Opium Commission. That conference assembled at The Hague on the 1st of last December and, after signing a convention, adjourned on the 23d of the following January. Amongst the most important articles signed by the delegates on behalf of their Governments were those which confirmed to China the abolition of the Indo-Chinese opium traffic. (See Ch. 4, International Opium Convention, p. 34, S. Doc. No. 733, 62d Cong., 2d sess.)

Article 16 of chapter 4 of the International Opium Convention is the pertinent one, so far as the proposed legislation is concerned. That article is as follows:

ARTICLE 16, INTERNATIONAL OPIUM CONVENTION.

"The Chinese Government shall promulgate pharmacy laws for its subjects, regulating the sale and distribution of morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts, and of the substances indicated in article 14 of the present convention, and shall communicate these laws to the Governments having treaties with China through the intermediary of their diplomatic representatives at Peking. The contracting powers having treaties with China shall examine these laws, and, if they find them acceptable, shall take the necessary measures to the end that they be applied to their nationals residing in China."

Thus it will be seen that the powers having treaty relations with China, amongst them the United States, have entered into a solemn pledge with the Chinese Government to apply such pharmacy laws to their nationals residing in China as will regulate the sale and distribution of opium, morphine, and cocaine, the object being to prevent the nationals of the treaty powers flooding China with remedies containing opium which are more baneful in their effects than the evils of opium smoking, which the Chinese are successfully suppressing.

This pledge on the part of the United States can be redeemed by the passage and approval of the accompanying bill.

In regard to the proposed bill, it can be stated that as a pharmacy act it is as satisfactory as Public No. 148, on which it is modeled, which has been in force in the District of Columbia for several years, and which has proved to be as efficient and workable as the pharmacy acts of any of the States of the Union.

As to the law features of the proposed bill as they affect Americans in China, it may be said to be without fault. It represents the combined efforts of Mr. Hamilton Wright, who has been in charge of the international aspects of the opium work on behalf of the American Government, of the members of the Far Eastern Division, and of the solicitors of the Department of State. Since its drafting it has been submitted to Judge Thayer, of the United States court in China, and to several of the American consuls general in that country. They have all commended it from the point of view of principle, and regard it as practicable and well within treaty and statutory law under which Americans reside in China.

It should be borne in mind that the Chinese Government has by resolution in the International Opium Commission and by treaty stipulation in the International Opium Convention requested this Government to pass this act, and that all Chinese conversant with the question will welcome the present act, if passed and approved, as a model act on which a Chinese national pharmacy act may be based.

The bases for American jurisdiction over Americans resident in China are founded—

1. On the right of citizens of the United States to frequent the open ports of China.

2. On the right of the American Government to superintend and regulate the concerns of citizens of the United States doing business at the open ports of China, together with the right of the United States to appoint consuls or other officers at the same ports.

3. The judicial authority of the United States over citizens who reside at the open ports of China.

First. By article 3 of the treaty of Wang Hea between United States and China, 1844, citizens of the United States were permitted to frequent the five ports of Quangchow, Amoy, Fuchow, Ningpo, and Shanghai, and to reside with their families and trade there; to proceed at pleasure with their vessels and merchandise to and from any foreign port and either of the said five ports, and from either of said five ports to any other of them. (See p. 474, Treaties Between China and Foreign States, vol. 1.)

The provisions of article 3 of the treaty of Wang Hea were reaffirmed and broadened by article 14 of the treaty of Tientsin between the United States and China, 1858, and there was added to the five ports mentioned in article 3 of the treaty of 1844 Swatow, Canton, and Taiwan in the island of Formosa. (See p. 315, ibid.)

Second. By article 4 of the treaty of Wang Hea it is provided that for the superintendence and regulation of the concerns of citizens of the United States doing business in the five ports mentioned in article 3 of that treaty the Government of the United States may appoint consuls or other officers at the time, who shall be duly recognized as such by the officers of the Chinese Government. (See p. 474, ibid.)

Article 10 of the treaty of Tientsin of 1858 reaffirms this right of the United States to appoint consuls at all of the open ports of China.

Third. By article 21 of the treaty of Wang Hea, 1844, the judicial authority of the United States over its citizens who are in residence at the open ports of China was reaffirmed, it being provided by article 21 that citizens of the United States who may commit any crime in China shall be subject to be tried and punished only by the consul or other public functionary of the United States authorized according to the laws of the United States, while subjects of China who may be guilty of any criminal act toward citizens of the United States were to be arrested and punished by the Chinese authorities and according to the laws of China. (See p. 481, ibid.) The provision of this article was amplified by article 25 of the same treaty, which provides that all questions in regard to rights, whether of property or person, arising between citizens of the United States and China shall be subject to the jurisdiction of and regulated by the authorities of their own Government, and all controversies occurring in China between citizens of the United States and the subjects of any other Government shall be regulated by the treaties existing between the United States and such Governments, respectively, without interference on the part of China. (See p. 483, ibid.)

Article 11 of the treaty of Tientsin, 1858, reaffirmed and amplified article 21 of the treaty of Wang hea. (See p. 513, ibid.)

Since these treaties were negotiated the Congress has passed several acts relating to the rights of American citizens in China, and to consular and to judicial jurisdiction over them. The earliest act of Congress which applies was that of August 11, 1848. (9 Stat. L., 276.)

In reporting the bill the Senate Judiciary Committee stated that the measure was considered necessary to the execution of the treaty of 1844 with China. The next legislation was that of June 22, 1860. (12 Stat. L., 72.) It was occasioned partly by the newly made treaty with China, commonly known as the Tientsin treaty of 1858. It extensively amplified and improved the earliest legislation, and, together with the act of July 1, 1870 (16 Stat. L., 183), relating to appeals in certain cases, formed the basis of the law as embodied in the Revised Statutes, sections 4083, 4130. (See p. 787, R. S. U. S., 2d ed., 1878.)

It is repeatedly declared in these statutes that they are intended to carry into effect the treaties which have granted extraterritorial jurisdiction to the United States in China, as well as other oriental countries. The jurisdiction as provided for in China is described with some fullness. The second leading feature of these statutes is that they set forth what law is to be applied in consular courts. (Secs. 4086, 4117–4120, 4126.) The jurisdiction in both criminal and civil matters is to be exercised and enforced in conformity with the laws of the United States, which are by these statutes, and so far as necessary and suitable under the treaties, extended over all citizens of the United States in China, and over all others who may have the right of American protection. If the laws of the United States, the statutes continue, are not adapted to the object of the treaties, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, the common law and the law of equity and admiralty shall extend in like manner over citizens and other protected persons in those countries. And if neither the common law nor the law of equity or admiralty nor the statutes of the United States furnish appropriate and sufficient remedies, the American minister in China shall issue regulations which shall supply such defects and deficiencies and shall have the force of law. (See pp. 41–42, "American Consular Jurisdiction in the Orient," Hinckley.)

These statutes have been somewhat modified, so far as China is concerned, by the act of June 30, 1906, creating a United States Court for China. That act impliedly removes all jurisdiction and the power of making regulations from the minister to China. It confers this jurisdiction and power upon the judge of the United States Court for China. A copy of the act of June 30, 1906, is attached.

The proposed act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and sale of poisons in the consular districts of the United States in China does not in any way transcend the consular and judicial authority of the United States in China, as provided for in the above-mentioned treaties and statutes. It should be stated in regard to section 13 of the proposed act which protects the act of Congress of February 23, 1887, providing for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the American-Chinese treaty of 1880, that this is necessary to prevent American citizens in the general act of practicing pharmacy from engaging in the opium trade in Chinese waters, as agreed to by the United States and China by article 2 of the treaty of 1880.

It may be stated as a general proposition that the Chinese Government has always welcomed the worthy exercise of the judicial functions of the United States which are reserved to this Government under the extraterritoriality provisions of our treaties, and the exercise of such power has always made for better relations between the two countries. The accompanying proposed pharmacy act, which is to apply to Americans resident in China, will serve as a sure indication of the solicitude of this Government to do its bounden duty toward China.

The Government of the United States "can, equally with any of the former or present Governments of Europe, make treaties providing for the exercise of judicial authority in other countries by its officers appointed to reside therein." (In re Ross, 1891, 140 U. S., 453, 463. See Moore, vol. 5, p. 161, third paragraph.)

The State Department favors this bill, as is shown by this letter from Secretary Bryan:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 15, 1911.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: There is now pending before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs the bill (S. 6631) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poison in China by Americans residing in the consular districts of the United States in that country. The Department of State is greatly interested in the passage of this bill.

The International Opium Commission which met at Shanghai in 1909 recommended that each Government represented at the meeting should enact certain proposed legislation upon this subject. The International Opium Conference at The Hague subsequently adopted a convention, to which the United States is signatory, pledging the signatory powers to the enactment, among other laws, of just such legislation as is proposed in the bill mentioned.

Unless this bill or one of similar import be enacted into law, it will be impossible for the American consuls in China to regulate the purchase, sale, and distribution in China of opium, morphine, and other poisonous drugs by Americans or other persons owing allegiance to the United States in that country.

The Department of State trusts, therefore, that your committee will favorably report this bill, and that it will be passed at an early date.

The report upon the bill by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations gives further information as to the character and need of the legislation asked.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. J. BRYAN.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from this morning's Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an editorial from to-day's Washington Post. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the editorial?

Mr. MONDELL. The caption of the editorial is "Presidential dictation."

Mr. BORLAND. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] both object.

Mr. POWERS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. POWERS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article prepared by Marcus Borchardt, L. L. M., on the need of a United States official gazette. It is a well-prepared article and gives a great deal of valuable information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, can not the object of the gentleman be obtained by printing it as a document?

Mr. ADAIR. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] objects.

PRACTICE OF PHARMACY AND SALE OF POISON IN CHINA.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman from Virginia was going to offer an amendment to change the date from 1915 to 1916.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes. I move to amend the bill, Mr. Speaker, line 4, page 1, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteen."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, probably on Monday next the consideration of conference reports will interfere with the calling of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and in order that there may be another opportunity to pass bills that may be passed by unanimous consent I ask that we now proceed to the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the House now proceed to the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object, but in view of what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said about next Monday, I would like to remind him of the fact that to-morrow is one of the last six days of the session and suspensions and bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar are both in order every day from now on, although probably we will not get at them very often.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

RESERVATION OF SCHOOL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20851) to reserve lands to the Territory of Alaska for educational uses, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest, although I suppose it is an unnecessary suggestion to make, that if the bill is to be read and consent is to be granted it would better be done on the Senate bill than on the House bill.

Mr. LENROOT. That is my intention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been on the calendar for a long time. I believe the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has a companion bill.

Mr. LENROOT. This is an Alaskan bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, if unanimous consent is to be given, as I understand it is, I will ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Committee on the Public Lands from the consideration of the Senate bill 7515, it being a bill identical in form and verbiage which passed the Senate and was inadvertently referred to the House committee.

Mr. MANN. We want to be sure now that somebody has compared the two bills and has seen to it that the Senate bill is the same as the House bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I am so informed by the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM].

Mr. MANN. It can be read, and the fact can easily be ascertained by comparison.

Mr. FERRIS. I have made no comparison of the bills myself. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the House Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 7515, and ask that the Senate engrossed bill be read so that we can compare it with the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that in place of House bill 20851, Senate bill 7515 be read for the purpose later of asking unanimous consent for its consideration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 7515) to reserve lands to the Territory of Alaska for educational uses, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That when the public lands of the Territory of Alaska are surveyed, under direction of the Government of the United States, sections Nos. 16 and 36 in each township in said Territory shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved from sale or settlement for the support of common schools in the Territory of Alaska; and section 33 in each township in the Tanana Valley between parallels 64 and 65 north latitude and between the one hundred and forty-fifth and the one hundred and fifty-second degrees of west longitude (meridian of Greenwich) shall be, and the same is hereby, reserved from sale or settlement for the support of a Territorial agricultural college and school of mines when established by the Legislature of Alaska upon the tract granted in section 2 of this act: Provided, That where settlement with a view to homestead entry has been made upon any part of the sections reserved hereby before the survey thereof in the field, or where the same may have been sold or otherwise appropriated by or under the authority of any act of Congress, or are wanting or fractional in quantity, other lands may be designated and reserved in lieu thereof in the manner provided by the act of Congress of February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 791): Provided further, That the Territory may, by general law, provide for leasing said land in area not to exceed one section to any one person, association, or corporation for not longer than 10 years at any one time: And provided further, That if any of said sections, or any part thereof, shall be of known mineral character at the date of acceptance of survey thereof, the reservation herein made shall not be effective or applicable, but the entire proceeds or income derived by the United States from such sections 16 and 36 and such section 33 in each township in the Tanana Valley area hereinbefore described, and the minerals therein, together with the entire proceeds or income derived from said reserved lands, are hereby appropriated and set apart as separate and permanent funds in the Territorial treasury, to be invested, and the income from which shall be expended only for the exclusive use and benefit of the public schools of Alaska or of the agricultural college and school of mines, respectively, in such manner as the Legislature of Alaska may by law direct.

SEC. 2. That section No. 6, in township No. 1 south of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 1 west of the Fairbanks meridian; section No. 31, in township No. 1 north of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 1 west of the Fairbanks meridian; section No. 1, in township No. 1 south of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 2 west of the Fairbanks meridian; and section No. 36, in township No. 1 north of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 2 west of the Fairbanks meridian, be, and the same are hereby, granted to the Territory of Alaska, but with the express condition that they shall be forever reserved and dedicated to use as a site for an agricultural college and school of mines: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to interfere with or destroy any legal claim of any person or corporation to any part of said lands under the homestead or other law for the disposal of the public lands acquired prior to the approval of this act: Provided further, That so much of the said land as is now used by the Government of the United States as an agricultural experiment station may continue to be used for such purpose until abandoned for that use by an order of the President of the United States or by act of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I think the question is whether the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged and present consideration had of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understood it, the request for unanimous consent was that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 7515, and that it be read for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the passage of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Was the unanimous consent given?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The consent to discharge the committee and to have the bill read at the Clerk's desk was given, but the unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill has not been given. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is this bill drawn for the purpose of locating the site of the agricultural college in Alaska?

Mr. LENROOT. It is not, except that if the Territory of Alaska shall use this as a site, it makes a grant of these four sections for that purpose. If they do not use the four sections for an agricultural college, the four sections revert to the Government.

Mr. NORTON. Well, in case the Legislative Assembly of Alaska should determine to locate the agricultural college elsewhere, would the Territory then receive the grant of land, being sections 33 in the townships enumerated?

Mr. LENROOT. It would only affect the four sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill has just been read. It is not customary to read it again unless somebody asks for it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the gentleman makes that motion I wish to correct a statement that I made in response to a question of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON]. I stated to him that if the agricultural school was not located on this tract it would not affect the grant. I find that it does.

Mr. NORTON. That is what I thought, and I certainly should object to the consideration of the bill if that is intended to be the law.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I hope the gentleman will not do that. There is nothing that we need up there more than this.

Mr. MADDEN. It is too late to object now, as consent for the consideration of the bill has been granted.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I know, but where a mistake has been made no gentleman is going to take advantage of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Was that statement made before consent was given?

Mr. MANN. Yes; and the gentleman had reserved the right to object.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that the provision which locates this agricultural college at a certain place near Fairbanks, irrespective of the desire of the people of Alaska as may be expressed by their legislative assembly, and provides that unless it is located on these four sections the grant of land will not go to the State Agricultural College of Alaska, is not, in my opinion, a fair provision and savors altogether too much of special congressional legislation for the benefit of a particular city or locality in Alaska to meet my approval.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that, after all, that is not very material. It has never been customary to give any of this land to an agricultural college under such conditions, and if the Territory of Alaska or the territorial legislature conclude that they want to locate the college somewhere else it will practically be a matter of form for Congress to do the same thing for that location that it has done for this.

Mr. NORTON. Why should not Congress at this time reserve or grant this land for a State agricultural college in Alaska, and leave it to the people of Alaska and to the legislative assembly of Alaska to determine its proper location, as has been done in other States?

Mr. MANN. One reason is that we want, if we can, to get rid of an expensive proposition that we have up there. I do not know whether we will succeed in it or not. I do not know whether the committee contemplated that. We have an experiment station on this land, have we not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MANN. While the raising of agricultural products there is undoubtedly profitable, yet this station is very costly, and they do not raise enough to pay the expenses of it, and never will.

Mr. NORTON. How much land is included in this grant?

Mr. MANN. Quite a large amount—one section in every township in a territory probably more than 75 or 100 miles square.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is 66⅔ miles one way and about 200 the other.

Mr. MANN. Equivalent to at least 100 miles square.

Mr. NORTON. How many acres are included in the grant?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is not a grant, but a mere reservation. Congress may set it aside at any time.

Mr. NORTON. It is to be reserved for the use of this agricultural college.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Only the four sections at the United States experiment station at Fairbanks were granted. These sections are granted to the Territory because of all spots in the Territory that is the place where the agricultural college ought to be. The Government has chosen that spot as the proper place for an agricultural experiment station, and through this bill we have chosen that location for an agricultural college.

Mr. MANN. An agricultural college anywhere else in Alaska, and I am not sure but one at this place, would be a joke—either an agricultural college or a school of mining. But if it is to be located up there at all, at present, it ought to be located at the experiment station.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is really the smallest part of this bill. The really valuable part of the bill is that it reserves the school lands for the Territory of Alaska which have never been reserved heretofore. Every other Territory at the time it was organized had sections 16 and 36 in each township reserved for the support of common schools. We have nothing of that kind in Alaska. We have no public lands, no school lands, no school fund, no school law, no school system. We have 10,000 children of school age and substantially no schools for them. Our legislature meets the 1st of March, and if we can get this bill passed the legislature can begin to pass legislation for the support of our common schools. This bill has been approved by Secretaries Lane and Houston before the committees of the Senate and House. It has been before the committees for a year. It has been most carefully considered. It is one of the most urgent necessities in the development of Alaska, and I certainly hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. NORTON. There is no one in this House who is more in favor of setting aside public land for school purposes than I am, but I do not believe it is a proper function at all for this Congress to say where in Alaska this agricultural college shall be located.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It does not say that.

Mr. NORTON. I think that is a function that properly belongs to the people of Alaska and to their legislative assembly.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The bill does not say that.

Mr. NORTON. It practically says that. No land is granted or reserved for a State agricultural college, unless the college is located on the four sections near Fairbanks.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The bill makes a grant of four sections at this particular place, because the Government and everybody else agree that that is the best place for the location of that particular kind of an institution.

Mr. NORTON. If the gentleman will permit me to read for a moment, the bill says, beginning on page 1, line 3:

> That when the public lands in the Territory of Alaska are surveyed under direction of the Government of the United States sections Nos. 16 and 36 in each township in said Territory shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved from sale or settlement for the support of common schools in the Territory of Alaska.

That is very good, and I heartily approve that portion of the bill.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. It continues—

> And section 33 in each township in the Tanana Valley.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Notice, that is in the Tanana Valley.

Mr. NORTON. Between parallels 64 and 65 north latitude——

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is 66⅔ miles.

Mr. NORTON. And between the one hundred and forty-fifth and the one hundred and fifty-second degrees of west longitude.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is about 200 miles.

Mr. NORTON. How many acres does that include?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That would take in 1 section out of each 36.

Mr. NORTON. I know that; but how many acres would that be?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I judge about 80 sections.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Eighty sections would be a little over 50,000 acres.

Mr. LENROOT. It comprises, I think, about 180,000 acres.

Mr. NORTON. I think it would be even more than that. However, the language of the bill continues:

And the same is hereby reserved from sale or settlement for the support of a Territorial agricultural college and school of mines when established by the Legislature of Alaska—

Now, it does not stop there, but it continues as follows:

upon the tract granted in section 2 of this act.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman seems to be laboring under the idea that here is a grant of land. All that it does in the world is to preserve from disposition this tract of land. The grant is a subject for the future, and there is no doubt that if the Territory of Alaska chooses to establish this agricultural college at some other point, that when it comes time to make a grant of school lands it will require further legislation and Congress will not refuse to make the grant because the college is not established on this tract.

Mr. NORTON. The language is, "reserved from sale or settlement for the support of a Territorial agricultural college and school of mines." It may be conceded that it does not make an express grant of this land. The grant will be made and completed when the Territory is admitted as a State?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. This is preliminary to the complete grant of all title?

Mr. LENROOT. The only thing this does is to prevent its being disposed of. As far as any declaration as to the purpose it is absolutely immaterial, except in future legislation Congress will make the grant in general accord with the purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to direct the attention of gentlemen to the phraseology in section 2, where there is an express grant.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; there is an express grant of four sections.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alaska is it the intention of the legislature to establish an agricultural college?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I hope to have it done in March, when the legislature meets.

Mr. FALCONER. Is it the intention to have other educational institutions located in the same place in Alaska, or do you expect to have an agricultural college in one place and a college of arts and sciences in another?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. This is for an agricultural college and a school of mines only. This is in the agricultural region of the interior.

Mr. FALCONER. I want to say that, as a matter of economics, it is a question as to whether it is an advantage to any State or Territory to have a university located in one part of the Territory and an agricultural college in another. It is true that in Washington, as well as in other States, it is reported to have cost the taxpayers a great amount of money having educational institutions located in different parts of the State, and I think that will be true in Alaska. If this is the proper time, as far as Alaska is concerned, with a population of 35,000 white people, to establish an agricultural college and a university and a school of mines in one place, all right; but I should object at any time if I were a citizen of the Territory of Alaska, or as a Congressman here, having to do with the welfare of Alaska, in having two educational institutions in that Territory located in different parts of the Territory at this particular stage of development—just now when the Government is on the eve of great development in the fertile valleys of the Territory.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. This only provides for an agricultural college and a school of mines. Formerly it provided for a university, but the Secretary objected to the use of the word "university" and it is stricken out at his request.

Mr. FALCONER. Does the gentleman feel that it is necessary at this time to establish an agricultural college in Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; I do, or I would not be urging it.

Mr. NORTON. Would the gentleman accept an amendment to strike out the words "upon the tract granted in section 2 of this act"?

Mr. LENROOT. I would have no objection except on account of the peculiar situation of the bill at this time with reference to the other end of the Capitol; but I think the gentleman must see that this is immaterial, inasmuch as this only reserves the land, and it is within the complete control of Congress.

Mr. NORTON. It reserves it if this school is located in this identical place.

Mr. LENROOT. The reservation is made whether the school is located in that place or not. The declaration is that the purpose of the reservation shall be for the support or assistance of this school if located there, but the reservation is complete whether the school is located there or not located at all.

Mr. NORTON. I question the gentleman's interpretation.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the statement that this bill does not contain a grant is somewhat questionable, because the original grant of sections 16 and 36 was in these words, substantially: "There is hereby reserved for common schools in the different States sections 13 and 36."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls for the regular order.

Mr. NORTON. I object.

Mr. LENROOT. I would agree to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

LEASING OF OIL AND GAS LANDS WITHDRAWN FROM ENTRY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 5434, "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits to the occupants of certain unpatented lands on which oil or gas has been discovered, and authorizing the extraction of oil or gas therefrom."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN and Mr. MADDEN objected.

Mr. FALCONER. Do gentlemen understand that the Legislature of the State of Washington, and I presume other legislatures, have memorialized Congress asking for this legislation?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know what the bill is?

Mr. FALCONER. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. It legislates three or four lawsuits out of court.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. MANN and Mr. MADDEN] object.

RESERVATION OF SCHOOL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before taking up the next bill the Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from further consideration of Senate bill 7515, and that bill is now on the Speaker's table. The Senate bill was read for the purpose of unanimous consent. Objection was made to the consideration of the bill, and the bill is now before the House in some way.
